Always I find these gentlemen concealing themselves behind President Wilson, because President Wilson is a great President; because he is a great man; because he is a great Democrat; because we Democrats put him forward and the people of the United States accepted him. Because of that you find every fellow who wants to hide himself or give to himself a certificate of good character seeks in some way to stand within the shadow of President Wilson.

I have no reason to say a word against Mr. Hoover; I have never met him but once, and then upon a committee, where I asked him some questions. I have nothing to say against Mr. White, who thrusts himself into this controversy; but my information regarding Mr. White is that he is a gentleman who, like Mr. Hoover, resided for many, many years in London; that the Belgian Relief Committee was organized in London; that he became a member of it there; that he has accompanied Mr. Hoover to this country; and that probably the only work or business he has done in this country for many years is what he is doing now as an assistant to Mr. Hoover. I do not know what his business operations were in England, but my information is he was there long enough to go through the bankruptcy courts.

Now, Mr. President, I am coming to additional evidence that Mr. Hoover's operations or the operations of the Belgian Relief Committee did affect our markets; did affect high prices in this country, in part—I do not charge it all to them—and that the very conditions against which Mr. Hoover has inveighed and which he has charged to food gamblers were, in part, due to operations of his own committee.

Mr. President, here I go back to the market reports, to the accounts current, of events as they transpired in the year 1915. I shall perhaps astound some of you when I say that these reports show that the first demand in recent years for the closing of exchanges came because of the operations I am about to refer to.

The records of the produce exchanges of the United States in the early part of the year 1915 disclose that Hoover, through his buying for the relief of Belgium, so dealt in our markets as to force the price of wheat to so high a figure that President Wilson was compelled to call on the Attorney General for an investigation of the corner. I quote from the New York American, January 16, 1915, page 11:

The wheat market was again the scene of pronounced excitement, and prices soared to new high records. The strength was based on continued buying by Europe, and sales in the day were estimated at 1,500,000 bushels, of which about 1,250,000 were sold to the American Relief Association out of Buffalo stock. The Liverpool market was very strong. Clearances from the seaboard were larger than the receipts and the total week's shipments were more than 9,000,000 bushels. The cash situation was the dominating factor in the market. Prices have attained such an unusual high level that traders have become somewhat afraid of the market, and operators seem more disposed to turn their attention to corn In the local cash market No. 2 red winter wheat was quoted at $1.54½, and No. 2 hard $1.54½.

It will not be disputed that the American Relief Association above referred to was in fact what we commonly call the Belgian Relief Association. The correct name is the American Belgian Relief Association.

WILSON ORDERS WHEAT POOLS INVESTIGATED.

President Wilson, it became known to-day, has included pooling agreements in the possible causes for the recent rise in the price of wheat and flour, which he has directed Attorney General Gregory to investigate.

The President sent Mr. Gregory a letter to-day formally asking him to investigate with a view to prosecution if evidence was disclosed of illegal combinations. The investigation already was in progress on oral word from the White House, but up to the present time no facts warranting criminal action have been discovered.

The President's letter reached the Department of Justice to-day too late for formal action by Attorney General Gregory. It was said to-night that further steps here might be found unnecessary in view of the investigation already begun at Chicago.

R. B. Ward, head of the Ward Bread Co., said yesterday—

Notice that this was the very time that the Belgian Relief Committee was buying 1,250,000 bushels of wheat on one day in one market—that if flour stayed at the present price it would eventually lead to an increase in the price of bread. "The European countries are buying wheat regardless of cost," he said, "and are willing to go still higher."

James Ward Warner, president of the New York Produce Exchange, yesterday denounced the action of Washington politicians in trying to have an embargo placed on the exportation of wheat.

Mr. Warner does not believe the investigation ordered by President Wilson will result in evidence of efforts of large interests to corner the wheat market.

"The reason why the Belgium Relief Committee is the greatest bull factor in the wheat market," said Mr. Warner, "is that the committee buys at almost any price. The committee does not care how much it pays for the staple, because it is giving it away."

That is a mistake; they did not give it all away.

Other buyers for export would be more careful, owing to the possibility of reselling at a loss.

Again I quote from the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of January 16, 1915, page 7:

HEAVY EXPORTS FORCING WHEAT STEADILY UPWARD.

Wheat was excited again yesterday and reached new high levels, with the May delivery at Chicago touching $1.45¼. Export buying continued unabated and at the close of business was placed at 2,000,000 bushels, but which might run up to 2,500,000 bushels, or possibly 3,000,000 bushels when all reports are in.

Now notice:

This included the sale by Armour of 1,250,000 bushels to the Belgian Relief Committee.

Notice that Mr. Armour was at that time in close connection with this committee. I do not say in any wrongful connection.

Again it is said:

CHICAGO WHEAT HIGHER.

All available supplies largely disposed of and producers not replenishing was the way trained observers explained the amazingly rapid lightening of the wheat market. Export clearances of 1,449,000 bushels for the last 24 hours, a rate that threatened to sweep the big terminals bare, formed hint enough for the bulls. In addition, Liverpool quotations had jumped, and virtually the entire floating supply at Buffalo was reported as having been laid hold of to meet the wants of the starving people in Belgium.

I am not saying that this was wrong. It may have been unwise, but it is not like the gambling that I was talking about. I am saying, however, that having caused that very condition of high prices, or having been one of the chief causes, Mr. Hoover ought not to have gone to our country charging the high prices to the grain gamblers, demanding that the grain exchanges be closed and that the business of the United States be turned over to him, when as a matter of fact he was himself the most responsible party in all the United States for the condition that existed, if these accounts are to be credited, and they were current accounts of the time.

Again the Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of January 18, at page 15, states:

Export buying, however, has been on a tremendously heavy scale all week, with a goodly portion taken by the Belgian Relief Commission There can be no doubt that if the exports keep up as they have been doing since the first of the year the surplus will be exhausted in 60 days. What the immediate future holds forth in the way of price sensations can only be guessed. Chicago May seems likely to attain its goal of $1.50 that was set for it soon after the war broke out.

Also in the Journal of Commerce of January 19 a discussion occurs in which the question of embargo was solemnly put forward. It is in part:

One report stated that President Wilson had ordered a vigorous investigation, but this was subsequently denied. It all has the effect of scaring the public out of the market, and it was profit taking and general liquidation by outside traders that was the chief cause of the decline.

Then comes a discussion of embargoes that have existed in the past.

I ask that the entire article be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Wheat presented a very nervous market yesterday, with Chicago May selling down to $1.40 and as high as $1.42¾ in comparison with the close on Saturday of $1.41–58 asked. Not much export business was accounted for up to the close, although it was thought that the total would reach 1,000,000 bushels. The action of the market was governed by reports from Washington and elsewhere concerning the likelihood of an investigation by the Government on the recent advance in wheat prices. One report stated that President Wilson had ordered a vigorous investigation, but this was subsequently denied. It all has the effect of scaring the public out of the market, and it was profit taking and general liquidation by outside traders that was the chief cause of the decline. It is gradually becoming understood, however, that the Government has little or no power in the matter. It would be unconstitutional to lay an export tax, while on only two occasions in the history of the United States has there been an attempt to lay embargo on exports. In one instance President Jefferson in 1808 tried it and in another President Madison in 1813 tried it. In the latter case the uprising of the farmers was so strong that the law was repealed before it had a chance to go into operation or be tested in the courts, while in the other it was of such short duration that it had little effect. In the present instance it is believed that the agricultural interests of the country would raise such a storm of protest that Congress would not dare to try the experiment.

Mr. REED. Then I read from the New York American of January 16, 1915, page 5:

RISE IN WHEAT MEANS 7-CENT BREAD HERE.

The housewife's loaf is shrinking, shrinking, and the price is rising, rising—

And they might have added, Hoover is buying and buying.

A representative of one of the largest baking establishments in New York said yesterday that unless there is a decided drop in the price of wheat within a week the small bakers, at least, will be forced to increase the price of a pound loaf of bread to 7 cents, and that the larger baking companies will be forced to follow within a month.

"The small bakeries are having a hard time now," he said, "and in many parts of the city they are mixing rye flour with wheat in order to make up the weight.

"Flour now is selling at $7.25 a barrel. The price at which wheat sold to-day—$1.54 for May delivery—will make the cost of milling and racking more than $8.25 a barrel, and shipment and delivery charges will, I am convinced, increase the price within a week or so to $10 a barrel.

"The alternative is to decrease the size of the loaf. Nothing will be accomplished by that, however, as the purchaser will be getting a loaf only two-thirds the weight of the present loaf.

"There is no remedy except to hold the wheat here instead of sending it abroad, and it is doubtful if anything, except an embargo by Congress, would curtail the selling to foreign countries. It is doubtful even if this would be effective, as the farmers are holding wheat."

An appeal yesterday was telegraphed to President Wilson by the National Housewives' League to curtail the selling of wheat abroad. The telegram said:

"The National Housewives' League, representing 900,000 American families, appeals to you. in view of the situation regarding wheat and flour, to take drastic measures at once to protect your people, even if necessary to place an embargo upon those products"—

That was the appeal that was sent to President Wilson.

George A. Zabriskie, eastern representative of the Pillsbury Co., declared that flour is likely to reach famine prices.

Again in the Journal of Commerce of January 18, 1915, is a statement bearing out that which I have already read. I ask to insert it in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made in the absence of objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FLOUR AT HIGHER PRICES THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

The effect of the advance in wheat has been to advance flour prices throughout the country. In some instances this price had the effect of stimulating buying and in others causing it to hold off. In most instances, however, it has stimulated shipping directions. Additional reports to the Northwestern Miller state that at Chicago the week closed with the most exciting wheat market for many months and resulted in millers being obliged to mark up their quotations on flour and mill feed daily.

FLOUR REMAINS HIGH.

Flour remained at the high levels established during the latter part of last week, the mills being disinclined to take chances on the present uncertain conditions of the wheat market. Sales were small, amounting to only a car or two at a time, and not amounting to very much in the aggregate. With such a decidedly unsettled market as there is at the present, buyers showed a decided inclination to restrict their purchases to nearby requirements. Although the general belief is that wheat will sell still higher, there is hope that it will be possible to obtain flour at lower prices on such rates as have occurred recently. The fear of investigation by the Washington authorities was not regarded as of particular moment other than to upset the market for the time being. The trade realizes that wheat is governed by war conditions, and the fact that it is going out of the country at a rate that will place the American markets on a domestic basis within a few weeks is something that will not be controlled by anything that Washington can do.

Mr. REED. Again I ask leave to insert an article from the Economist, of Chicago, Ill., under date of January 16, which bears out the statements I have already made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made in the absence of objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the Economist, Chicago, Ill., Jan. 16, 1915.]

Exports to Europe are slowly but steadily draining the United States of its surplus in all cereals. This week the enormity of this outflow of grains, and particularly of wheat, has seized the minds and imaginations of the trade and wild speculative markets resulted with the greatest interest centered in May wheat. This has reached and maintained itself at levels the highest since the Leiter year. Fluctuations have covered an 8-cent range, and a high price for the May option of $1.43⅜ was touched Thursday. The market is extremely hazardous and violent changes are probable with increasing number and more severe reactions and rallies as the price advances. The net change from the close yesterday week through Thursday was a gain of 5⅛ to 5¼ for May and a loss of ⅜ for July. One of the leading bulls states that May wheat, in his opinion, will reach $2 and that May corn will sell at $1.

The importance of the situation scarcely can be overestimated, for the Board of Trade now has the practical problem to face of feeding all Europe and at the same time attending to the needs of this country for reserves and flour. Durum wheat, such as is used for the manufacture of Italian spaghetti, is worth $2.07 c. i. f. Genoa. The possibilities are obvious when American bakers are seriously considering 6 cents as a price for a loaf of bread when our wheat is about $1.40. Italy has been particularly active in its bidding for American wheat, and its harbors are reported choked with grain boats at present. Last week our exports were approximately 8,000,000 bushels as compared with 2,000,000 bushels for the corresponding week of January, 1914. In other words, the foreign demand has about quadrupled. This is reason enough for the advance in speculative and cash prices. In fact, the wonder is that advances have not been much greater than already have been scored.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the statements I have put in the RECORD simply demonstrate that when we were sitting here in the Senate, as we were five or six weeks ago, excited because of the high prices, excited because Mr. Hoover told us that the grain gamblers had "rigged" our markets and were robbing our people, excited to a point where we could not even pause to investigate, excited to a point where we regarded it to be a sort of a crime for a man to ask for a few hours to discuss the terms of the bill—I say that this evidence demonstrates that one of the chief factors in running up the prices of food products was Mr. Hoover himself.

If Mr. Hoover or his committee had come to the American people and said "I have done these things, but the result of it all is that prices are very high, and there should be a regulation of these prices," I would have made no complaint. But Mr. Hoover came to the American people and alarmed and excited them; he came to the American Congress and alarmed and excited it with the claim that gamblers and wicked men were "rigging" the markets of this country. I do not say there is not some gambling, but I do say that Mr. Hoover's own operations were the chief causes for the increase of prices, and that a false impression was given to the American people.

Mr. President, we may shut our eyes to the facts if we please, and we may turn over to Mr. Hoover the grain business of the United States; we may turn over to him and those gentlemen he has brought with him from merry England the domination of our markets and our farms; we may give them the right to say to the farmer "You shall have no place to sell," and to say to the miller, "You shall have no place to buy." We may put them in command of the finances and of the success and of the fortunes of 45,000,000 people engaged in agriculture in this country. We can do these things, because perhaps we have the power, but I appeal to the sober sense of the country and to the sober sense of this body that this thing ought not to be done; that it is an abomination; that it is an iniquity; that it is an inexcusable wrong.

What we ought to have done was what we attempted to do. We passed here in the Senate a bill known as the food-survey bill. It had come from the House with a number of wholesome provisions in it. We amended it. We put into that bill a provision that would have stopped every particle of gambling in every exchange in the United States; we put into that bill a provision that would stop hoarding; we gave to the President the power to close every exchange where gambling was permitted. We sent that bill back to the House, where it ought to have received attention within 24 hours. It was held up; conferees were not allowed to act or even to be appointed. I repeat what I have often stated before, that it was held up at the demand of a Cabinet officer, who insisted that, if it were passed a part of the argument in favor of the food control or food dictatorship bill would be gone. That bill thus held up for weeks and weeks and weeks was approved by the conferees and returned here within a few minutes after the House had coerced the Senate conferees into a surrender, which I regard as one of the most fateful that has ever taken place in the Congress of the United States.

And when the news is sent to the country that this legislation is held up—as some papers have said, "REED holds up the food bill"—I ask those papers to be generous enough and fair enough to say to the country that a bill that was passed in the Senate eight weeks before this bill was passed, a bill that would have stopped gambling in the exchanges, a bill that would have stopped hoarding of foodstuffs, a bill that would have armed the President with abundant authority to close every exchange in this country if he saw fit, was held up at the demand of a Cabinet officer during all of those long weeks, and is being held up now in this body in order that this bill, passed eight weeks after it was passed, shall be given the right of way and forced down the throat of a Senate the majority of whose Members regard it as an abomination.

This may not go to the country now, but this will go to the country.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. REED. "The Senator from Missouri" yielded to the Senator from Oklahoma, and the Senator from Oklahoma made that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma can not do that without the consent of the Senator having the floor. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I think the Chair is in error. "The Senator from Missouri" yielded for no particular purpose. He yielded to the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri does not yield the floor, does he?

Mr. REED. I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, Mr. President, if we are to have that kind of tactics employed, I myself suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. REED. And I enter an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Which one does the Senator wish put first?

Mr. REED. The rules of the Senate pretty clearly declare what is to be put first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll to determine the presence of a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	McNary	Sterling
Bankhead	James	New	Sutherland
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Thompson
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Underwood
Brandegee	Kellogg	Pittman	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Culberson	King	Pomerene	Warren
Curtis	Kirby	Reed	Weeks
France	Knox	Saulsbury	Williams
Gore	La Follette	Sheppard
Hitchcock	McCumber	Smith, Md.
Hollis	McKellar	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But 45 Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. HARDING, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. SIMMONS answered to their names when called.

Mr. LEWIS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on official business.

Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. CUMMINS, and Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I now desire to ask the Senate to consider the remarkable result brought to us by the conferees.

After a discussion which lasted for weeks, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry brought to the Senate certain amendments which it asked the Senate to adopt, and after full discussion those amendments were adopted. Among these amendments was one which proposed, instead of turning over to Mr. Hoover all power and authority touching the matter of foods, to create a commission of three men, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. That important provision has been stricken from the bill.

The Senate placed limitations upon the licensing of concerns engaged in business. The provision as now brought back to us is many times more radical than it was when it came to us from the House. Not only is the Senate amendment gone, but the Senate conferees, in their haste to recede, retreated beyond the line of the old House bill. In absolute disregard of the mandate of the Senate, the Senate conferees not only yielded all the Senate had asked, but, in addition to that, yielded more than the House had originally asked. The Senate added, and by repeated votes demanded, the creation of an auditing committee to see that the people's money shall not be wasted; that provision is gone. The Senate added an amendment making it clear that labor organizations should not lose the benefits of the Clayton bill. That provision also is gone.

There are other provisions to which later on I shall call attention upon which the Senate conferees beat a hasty, and if they were not Senators I would say an ignominious, retreat; but of course I can not say that of Senators.

I now challenge the attention of the Senate to new language that appears in this bill; and if other men view it as I view it, it is enough to shake the Senate from its lethargy, and to reach the deaf ears of men, if such there be, who no longer care for country or for Constitution. It will take me a moment to lay the groundwork for this statement.

On page 2 you will find that the bill is now made to cover foods, feeds, fuel, fuel oil, natural gas, fertilizer and ingredients, tools and utensils and equipment used in the production of said things, and also to prevent local or general scarcity, monopolization, hoarding and speculation and private control, and to establish and maintain what? Governmental control over these things.

Observe that the bill has been so enlarged that it not only covers foods, feeds, and fuels, but it covers in addition to that the tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuels.

Mr. President, what does that embrace? It embraces every coal mine in the United States; it embraces every flouring mill in the United States; it embraces every packing house in the United States, every cold-storage plant in the United States, everything that manufactures any food product or any fuel product, and every machine that makes the machinery with which these things are produced. It is so broad as to include many things that will startle some of the gentlemen who, when the bill was in the Senate, having found the enterprises and business in which their States were specially concerned in the bill hastened to amend it in order to get from under the bill. For instance, the cottonseed mill in which oil is expressed will come within the terms of the bill. It will embrace the linseed-oil mill, because that comes within the terms of the bill. It will cover every sawmill of the United States. In its wide sweep it reaches out and takes possession first and last, in my judgment, of the major portion of the manufacturing business of the United States. But singularly enough it leaves the old Steel Trust out. It leaves the copper combination out. It leaves the Standard Oil Co. out. It leaves the Aluminum Trust out. It leaves out of the bill the most wicked, the most powerful, the most potential, and the most oppressive of all the great combinations and trusts in this country. It brings within the scope of the bill the farmer, the man who runs the little grist mill, the producer and handler of wheat and all kinds of food. It is a bill drawn for the purpose of controlling the less hurtful and the less monopolistic of our enterprises and businesses and to acquit of any control those things that have been most wicked and most potential and most injurious.

There is brought within the control of this bill one set of concerns that I do think is an improvement over the House bill, for the conferees allow to remain in the bill the Senate provisions regarding the control of coal. It is my opinion that a case has been made out which shows practically a control or agreement of prices among the coal dealers of the country, and I regard that as one business which ought to be disciplined and disciplined at once, not disciplined in the nature of punishment, but in the nature of a proper control.

Mr. President, having gained some idea of the scope of this bill, its magnitude, how far it reaches, let us observe what powers are granted. A Government control is established and maintained over all these things, and this language is used to accomplish that control. I wish Senators would take the pages of the bill and follow me. I call attention to page 8. To accomplish that control we find—

SEC. 5. That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section.

Now, mark you the language of the House bill as it came to us was that the President should first find that a rate, a charge, or a practice was unjust before he could interfere. The man who did not indulge in an unjust rate, practice, or charge was acquit of any control by the Government. The bill, as it came to us from the House, was aimed against only those who were guilty of unjust practices and charges, and the President was required, upon his honor in response to his official oath, first to find the unjust charge, first to find that a wicked thing had been done, before the President could lay his hands upon the business of the country. But what says the present bill: From time to time whenever the President shall find it essential to business to license. In other words, whenever the President sees fit by the simple promulgation of his decree, by the simple issuance of his proclamation, every man in the United States engaged in these verious businesses that are so numerous and so important that I can not wait to catalogue them all, businesses that you will find established in every hamlet, in every city, in every part of this land—the President may by simple public announcement take the management of those business enterprises from the proprietors thereof. Listen. I read:

From time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries * * * and shall publicly so announce—

Then the business can not go on except as I shall state. All the President has to do in the world is to put an article in the morning paper and say, "I, Woodrow Wilson, being of the opinion that it is essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of necessaries, do hereby proclaim that after the 1st of next month," or any other day he sees fit to fix, "no person shall engage in or carry on such business unless he shall hold a license issued pursuant to this law."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For what?

Mr. REED. For these things that I have named; and if the Senator from Nebraska will take the things I have named, the things that are in the bill, and allow his keen and acute mind to travel for a little bit along the lines of the bill, he will find that these things embrace every article of food and everything used in their production, every article of fuel and everything used in its production, some exceptions being made for retailers. It affects all that the farmer raises. The President of the United States can close the doors of every market in the United States for every farmer's product, and he can close every flouring mill, every wholesale house engaged in the business of selling flour or feeds or fuel or anything of that kind—everything except retailers—and he can do it, not upon the ground that evil practice has grown up, not upon the ground that any wickedness or wrong has been done by a single one of our people, but simply upon the ground that he "deems it essential." Then what happens? Then these men must take out a license.

The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees.

Under that, sir, a Federal agent can enter in one of these places of business. Under that the books of every one of these private citizens can be examined. Under that a man can walk in and simply showing his authority proceed to ransack and investigate from the contents of the safe and the books to the extremity of the business. It is a general warrant of search and it is the most remarkable power ever asked or conferred in a free country. But I read on:

The President is authorized to enter into any agreement—to create any agency and to employ any person and to coordinate any departments or agencies of the Government to enforce this bill.

He is authorized to command, to use and employ any department or agency of the Government. This means the Army and Navy of the United States.

It means to give the power to employ the Army and Navy of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, after this proclamation has been issued, this public announcement has been made, if a man shall venture to conduct his business one day, one hour, one moment beyond the time named in the public announcement without having a license, he can be fined $5,000 and sent to the penitentiary for two years and his business closed. His right to transact business as an American citizen is gone.

This arbitrary and confiscatory decree is to be executed through any agent the President may name. We know that one of the chief agents is to be Mr. Hoover, who has already been sufficiently discussed. Why have I discussed him? Because if a man is to be put in charge of the business of the people of the United States it is important to know whether he is a loyal-hearted American citizen whose every interest is American. It is important to know whether there is any influence drawing him in any other direction. It is important to know whether he is subject to any environment that might lead him to act against the interests of the people of the United States. It is important to know whether his experience be of such nature as to qualify him for the Herculean task.

There are two phases that I want to present. First, should this sort of power ever be conferred upon a human being, and, second, can it be conferred by the Congress of the United States? Let us deal with it first in its broader aspect, for I well know how unpopular it now is to refer to the Constitution of the United States. But I can not resist the temptation of saying that the day will come when the old ark of the covenant will be rescued and when those who have dared lay unholy hands upon it will no longer set in the seats of the mighty.

I am opposed to one-man power. I am opposed to any kind of one-man power anywhere, at any time, under any circumstances. The man who advocates a dictator for America is a traitor to America. The man who advocates a dictator in America is the friend of despotism and the enemy of democracy. The man who would create a dictator in America would do to us by peaceful revolution that which could only be done by a foreign conqueror, and if done by a foreign conqueror there was never one so despotic he would not in the end give some measure of self-government to even a subject people.

Yet I have heard men high in office say that what a Republic needs in time of war is a dictator.

I have heard a number say that the Constitution is suspended, or that the civil rights of the people cease when war is declared, and that is equivalent to a justification of a dictatorship.

I am opposed to a dictator also because no man knows enough to think for all the people. No man is wise enough to embrace within the horizon of his intellect all conditions of life, all forms of business, all hopes and aspirations and ambitions of a mighty people. And so, lest I should be accused of announcing a new and strange doctrine in these days when the Constitution is in disrepute, I venture to read. I apply this not only to a dictator but to certain boards that are being organized and authorized by this bill and that are being organized outside of it.

> I don't want a smug lot of experts to sit down behind closed doors in Washington and play Providence to me.

And neither do I want one, whether it be Mr. Hoover or some-hands of a group of men. I continue to read.

> There is a Providence to which I am perfectly willing to submit. But as for other men setting up as Providence over myself I seriously object. I have never met a political savior in the flesh, and I never expect to meet one.

A little further on the distinguished author of these words said:

> I would rather see a savior of the United States than set up to be one, because I have found out, I have actually found out, that men I consult with know more than I do, especially if I consult with enough of them. I never came out of a committee meeting or a conference without seeing more of the question that was under discussion than I had seen when I went in. And that, to my mind, is an image of government. I am not willing to be under the patronage of the trusts, no matter how providential a government presides over the process of their control of my life.
> I am one of those who absolutely reject the trustee theory, the guardianship theory I have never found a man who knew how to take care of me, and, reasoning from that point out, I conjecture that there is not any man who knows how to take care of all the people of the United States. I suspect that the people of the United States understand their own interests better than any group of men in the confines of the country understand them.

Thus said Woodrow Wilson, and so well did he say it that he saw fit to print it in a book entitled The New Freedom, and at the top of the page he indited the legend "Free men need no guardian." Were these words wise and prudent when they were uttered? I think they were, and on them I now stand. I do not change the principles of my political philosophy each time convenience asks that I shall change. I can not shift from these old principles because I suddenly become ambitious for power; I hold to them.

This, sir, was not a fugitive statement. At page 64 of the same book the distinguished President of the United States says to the country:

> I believe, as I believe in nothing else, in the average integrity and the average intelligence of the American people, and I do not believe that the intelligence of America can be put into commission anywhere. I do not believe that there is any group of men of any kind to whom we can afford to give that kind of trusteeship.
> I will not live under trustees if I can help it. No group of men less than the majority has a right to tell me how I have got to live in America. I will submit to the majority, because I have been trained to do it, though I may sometimes have my private opinion even of the majority. I do not care how wise, how patriotic, the trustees may be, I have never heard of any group of men in whose hands I am willing to lodge the liberties of America in trust.

Send that out to the country, ye heralds of a yet uncensored press and at the same time tell the people of the land that the liberties of the American people are by this bill lodged in the hands of a group of men. I continue to read.

I read this especially to those Members of Congress who publicly subscribe to this bill, although privately they denounce it as unwise and unjust—I read it not to those who expect to go back home declaring in good faith I exercised the best judgment I possessed and voted as my conscience dictated.

But I do read it to all who count upon gaining favor by chirping like so many insects, "I stood by the President, and therefore in his shadow am I holy and by his name am I protected." "I was a faithful follower." "My nose was long and keen and kept the scent, and so I followed where his feet had gone." "I did not think." "Oh, no; to think it were a crime in modern times." "My virtue was to follow, follow, and still to follow on in faithful servitude—to crawl beneath my master's legs and lick the dust from boots that held me in contempt even while I bowed and fawned." I read:

> If any part of our people want to be wards, if they want to have guardians put over them, if they want to be taken care of, if they want to be children, patronized by the Government, why, I am sorry, because it will sap the manhood of America.

Thus said Woodrow Wilson, and so say I, and so will say in time an outraged country, a proud people, a patient and a patriotic host, who none the less will hold responsible the men who lay the people's liberties aside by base surrender of the Constitution that the people wrote.

He added—and here it appeared there was some mistake made according to the idea of some but not according to mine—

> But I don't believe they do. I believe they want to stand on the firm foundation of law and right and take care of themselves. I, for my part, don't want to belong to a nation, I believe that I do not belong to a nation, that needs to be taken care of by guardians. I want to belong to a nation, and I am proud that I do belong to a nation, that knows how to take care of itself.

Now it is proposed to turn a large part of that Nation over to a gentleman whose name was not known in this country until a few months ago, when a press agency was set to work by this man who so loves publicity that when he started in the Belgian relief work he employed the English representative of the Associated Press as his press agent and has him here now in Washington.

Mr. President, let me read a little further from page 77; and let me read this to you as a prophecy which was true when made and which is true now:

> America is never going to submit to guardianship. America is never going to choose thraldom instead of freedom.

Mr. President, one further quotation upon this line—and I apply it to this attempt to turn over all the vast business of this land to a few people; this attempt to turn over to Mr. Hoover the destiny of the farmers, our great markets, our consumers; for, mark you now—and I wish that I could say this so that the American people might hear—the consumer will be affected as will be the producer. You can not interrupt the flow of the lifeblood in the body without you paralyze the extremities of the body. You can not interrupt the flow of commerce without the cost and penalty are visited upon all dependent upon commerce, and none are more dependent than are the people of the towns. Every embargo you place upon commerce is an added expense that must be paid for at the breakfast table and at the dinner hour. It is proposed to take the business of this country out of the hands of the men who have created it, out of the hands of the men who have lived with it. When I say "business" I include the farmer, the stock raiser, the planter; I include the carrier; I include the manufacturer. We are all in business. I include the laborer, whose business is that of selling his daily labor. I protest that they can manage their business better than can any one man. Again I read from President Wilson's book:

No one man understands the United States—

Not even Hoover.

No one man understands the United States. I have met some gentlemen who professed they did. I have even met some business men who professed they held in their own single comprehension the business of the United States, but I am educated enough to know that they do not.

"Where, where was Hoover then?" His form had not loomed on the intellectual horizon of the President. The President had not heard the magic name of the "miracle man."

I read this again. Though I read it to ears that will not be convinced, yet I shall make you all feel a little uncomfortable. Perhaps you will be convinced, for—

While the lamp holds out to burn,
An erring Senator even may return.

I repeat the quotation:

No one man understands the United States. I have met some gentlemen who professed they did. I have even met some business men who professed they held in their own single comprehension the business of the United States, but I am educated enough to know that they do not. Education has this useful effect, that it narrows of necessity the circles of one's egotism. No student knows his subject. The most he knows is where and how to find out the things he does not know with regard to it. That is also the position of a statesman. No statesman understands the whole country. He should make it his business to find out where he will get the information necessary to understand at least a part of it at a time when dealing with complex affairs. What we need is a universal revival of common counsel.

Now, we propose to have everything but "common counsel"; anything but common counsel; one dictator or a half dozen dictators; business to be divided up among them; and to what end? I make you the prediction now, claiming no authority as a prophet, that if you undertake this plan that you are upon you will find food as high 12 months from now as it is to-day; that you will find prices are higher 12 months from now than they are to-day, unless, indeed, the war shall have ceased, and men shall have gone back to their usual avocations.

I make you the prediction also that if you will stop interfering with production; if you will permit to become a law, without anything more, the food-survey bill which will have encouraged production and stop speculation and hoarding, and yet allow the mighty sinews of the American people to play unrestrained and the mighty energies of the American people to go uncontrolled, you will have a solution in part of high prices; not entirely, for while the war lasts there will be some high prices. I declare it to be my opinion that just in proportion as you have men like Hoover interfering with the trade of this country will you have high prices.

Mr. President, I come now to consider the question of the constitutionality of this remarkable provision. Again I call attention to the work of a distinguished author, for I am now presenting the idea that this bill undertakes to go into the several States of the Union and to have the Federal Government assume authority and jurisdiction over business institutions located within those States, and that the bill does not even propose to limit its control to interstate commerce. If this bill can be passed, there is no invasion of the States of the Union that can not be made; there is no limit to Federal authority. Even if we have the power to do this, is it wise to employ that power? Here I call attention to this language:

It would be fatal to our political vitality really to strip the States of their powers and transfer them to the Federal Government. It can not be too often repeated that it has been the privilege of separate development secured to the several regions of the country by the Constitution, and not the privilege of separate development only, but also that other more fundamental privilege that lies back of it—the privilege of independent local opinion and individual conviction which has given speed, facility, vigor, and certainty to the processes of our economic and political growth. To buy temporary ease and convenience for the performance of a few great tasks of the hour at the expense of that would be to pay too great a price and to cheat all generations for the sake of one.

So said Woodrow Wilson on pages 191 and 192 of his book entitled "Constitutional Government of the United States," and throughout the book there is more to the same effect.

Mr. President, what does this bill propose to do? It does not propose to limit the action of the President even to war measures; it does not propose to bottom the action the President may take upon the flimsy doctrine that was first inserted in the bill and has been since stricken out, that Congress by an act can declare a thing subject to a public use, and that it thereby becomes subject to a public use.

It bodly and with an effrontery that is almost admirable undertakes to place in the hands of the President the power, "whenever he deems it essential," to say to every business man engaged in the various callings, as specified in the bill—and as I have already said they are so broad as to embrace nearly everything—"I forbid you any longer to conduct your business, unless you come and get a license from me." That is not limited to interstate commerce, and even if it were it would be illegal. It is not limited by anything except the Executive will and pleasure. It gives to the President of the United States authority to issue a decree, a ukase, a mandate, and upon the issuing of it hundreds of thousands of men must on the day stated close the doors of their business, and if they again enter them for the purpose of doing business they can be sent to the penitentiary and fined $5,000.

It is true the bill states that they may apply for a license, and that when they have obtained the license they shall then do business—in the manner that they want to do business? No. In the manner that their interest requires? No. In the manner that the interest of the country requires? No. But in the way they are commanded to conduct it. If that be not the taking of property without due process of law, or any kind of law, then, indeed, was the Constitution written in vain.

Again I call the attention of Senators to the fact that we all agreed that when we had adopted a provision here that the President of the United States could take all the whisky and pay for it its cost plus a profit, I believe, of 10 per cent, that the provision was unconstitutional, because it was taking property without due process of law.

If it was taking property without due process of law when whisky was taken over and the cost paid and a profit in addition, what shall we say about due process of law when a man who has built a flouring mill, who is engaged in the legitimate business of grinding of flour, is by a mere proclamation of the President deprived of the right to enter his mill and is sent to the penitentiary if he dares enter his own mill and to set in motion a single wheel? If that be not taking property without any process of law, then, indeed, there is no protection under the Constitution.

I appeal to the Senators who conceded that they had to take out of the conference report the provision with regard to the taking of whisky and paying for it at cost plus a profit because it was unconstitutional, why is it not equally true if Congress says that whenever the President sees fit to issue a proclamation the owner of a factory shall not be permitted to turn his wheel or to employ his property that is not taking property without due process of law? I appeal to Senators why it is not equally taking property without due process of law if the proprietor is told, "You can not run your business as you see fit, but you shall run it in the manner and form we dictate; you shall not run it as your interest demands, but you shall run it in the manner and form that we say you shall run it." I appeal to men who have some respect for the Constitution, or had a fews days ago when we were discussing the liquor amendment, and even to the conferees who sat in conference and changed the liquor amendment, why this provision is not within the inhibition of the Constitution?

There will be no answer made to this; there can be no answer made to it. It does not have the shadow of pretext to sustain it.

Is it necessary? Is there anything in the condition of our land to-day that makes this necessary? Is there a man in this body who believes it can be done within the Constitution? But, of course, sir, when you give authority to employ all power and all force anything may be done. When you write this kind of power in a bill after having written in an express authority to take possession of the property of the people, the power to enter into any agreement, to create any agency, to employ any person, to coordinate any department or agency of the Government, "to command, use, and employ any department or agency of the Government," I say you have given authority that will be construed to include the Army of the United States. We had better go a little carefully.

We adopted a military bill. I am willing, Mr. President, to compel obedience to the draft; but I did not think when we passed the military bill that we were passing a bill to empower a drumhead court-martial to try and condemn to death men who simply ran away or who failed to appear when called.

And yet in the papers of yesterday morning we find this—I read the opening lines from the Washington Herald, where I happen to find the account, but I have seen it in all the papers. These are the headlines:

Draft rebels may be shot—Court-martial and firing squad, says Gen. Crowder, is penalty.

Reading from the text, just a line:

The short shrift of court-martial and the firing squad will be the lot of those who persist in resistance to the draft. The iron hand of the full military power of the Nation is ready.

Mr. President, when I voted for that bill I wanted, if we had the draft, to make it effective. I do yet; but I thought we were voting for a bill that would send to the penitentiary a man who would not obey the draft. I had an idea of a trial in a civil court. I had no thought at that time that it would ever be asserted that a drumhead court-martial could take out poor wretches who were too cowardly to come forward in response to the draft and who ran away because they feared death, and stand them up and shoot them to death. I am getting a little chary about giving authority when I find that kind of construction placed upon it.

Mr. President, before I quit the floor I desire to clear up a matter that came into dispute this morning—I am sorry the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is not here. The first thing that I call attention to is the statement that was made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I find, on reading it, that as my recollection served me I was correct, and that Mr. Hoover did not enter an absolute denial to the interview which I read this morning. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] stated:

> While I am not an apologist for Mr. Hoover and do not hold any brief for his defense, I was rather amazed at the statement—> and called him up over the telephone to ascertain whether that statement was made by him, because it disgusted me, as it must have disgusted everybody if it were authentic. Mr. Hoover assured me that he said nothing of the kind and nothing that could be construed into such a statement as was there given.

That is, the statement contained in the paper, the interview—

If the statement had stopped there, it would have amounted to what the Senator from California thought. But the Senator in charge of the bill continued:

> The most of his offending, he said, was to say that he had no control of Congress; he hoped that the food-control bill would be speedily passed, but what it would contain he could not say; but he only had the power of declining to act if it was a bill that in his opinion, when passed, he felt he could not conscientiously carry out. He said that was the most that he said.

If that does not pretty plainly disclose that he was discussing the bill to this lady to whom he gave the interview, and that he was discussing what Congress might do, and if he was not discussing whether he would or would not accept the bill, then, I do not understand the import of language. Nevertheless, I do not assert that he made the statement exactly as it was put in the papers. I simply offer them for what they are worth; and now I offer, in that connection, the statement that appeared in the evening papers of that same day. I read from the Washington Times of that same night. This same statement, in substance, appeared in a number of papers:

> Herbert C. Hoover will make no reply to the bitter attack Senator REED, of Missouri, made upon him in the Senate, charging the food administrator with rigging the food market when he was directing the Belgian relief work. Hoover said to-day that a reply to REED would only lead to another attack by REED and precipitate an unnecessary controversy. It is Hoover's intention, however, it was learned to-day, to take a definite step toward the forces that are holding up the food-control bill in the Senate. He will wait until action is taken Saturday, and if it does not meet his ideas he will go before the country with an exposure of Senators who block the bill and the influences he charges are behind them.

Now, it is singular if all the morning papers got this wrong, and then if the evening papers also got it wrong. The statement in the morning papers was sent all over the country. I hold in my hand a paper published at Moberly, Mo., that had the same report that I read from this morning. I am only speaking of these things now out of respect for the challenge of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], whose opinion and good will I value very highly, and I want him to understand just what I have acted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I express my appreciation of the fairness of the Senator from Missouri in reading the excerpt from what was said by the Senator from Oregon when this particular question recently arose, and may I add, too, something in which I think I will strike a sympathetic chord with the Senator from Missouri—that we ought not to hold any man on earth responsible for what may appear in newspapers regarding the particular individual? I am perfectly assured that if it were desired volumes could be printed here from newspapers concerning myself, volumes could be printed concerning nearly every individual upon this floor, and there would be none of us desirous of holding accountable any particular individual for what might be said of him by some particular newspaper. I am sure that the Senator from Missouri, on the statement that has been made here—the statement made by the Senator from Oregon, upon the assurance of Mr. Hoover—may acquit him wholly of the particular matters to which he adverted this morning in the published statement in one of the Washington papers.

Mr. REED. The Senator from California takes a different view of the matter than I do. When I find that this threat was made, according to the press, and when I find that within two days thereafter Mr. Hoover carries out the threat by attacking the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and when I find that he also sent out an article attacking myself, I am inclined to the opinion that he has not been greatly wronged; and when I find a man sending out a statement referring to himself as a "miracle man," I am prepared to think he will send out almost any kind of statement.

Mr. President, I have discussed certain phases of the conference. There is a question upon which I want to be briefly heard hereafter; but I desire at this time to yield the floor to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and to apologize to him in advance for temporarily leaving the Chamber. I shall be back as soon as I can.

WAR REVENUE (S. DOC. NO. 74).

During Mr. REED's speech,

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for the purpose of submitting a report?

Mr. REED. Certainly. May I ask the Senator if it will take some time?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just a few minutes.

On behalf of the Finance Committee, I present a favorable report upon the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments, and I submit a report (No. 103) thereon, with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to offer a resolution in reference to the printing of the bill which I have just reported. I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 110) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, as reported to the Senate on August 6, 1917, be printed as a Senate document in 10-point type, and that 15,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether the printing of the bill in the type provided for in the resolution will exceed the amount allowed under the law?

Mr. SIMMONS. To print the bill in that type I do not think will cost that much. I have not the estimate of cost, but I have been told by Mr. Wold that it will not exceed that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. That it will not exceed the amount allowed for printing under a Senate resolution?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be pretty close to it, and that is the reason why I asked the Senator the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the printing clerk has made the estimate, and he tells me that the cost of the printing will not exceed the amount authorized by law.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely asked the question. I have no objection to the printing of the bill as desired, if the cost does not exceed the amount allowed in such cases.

Mr. SIMMONS. I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 111) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That there be printed 65,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 103, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, entitled "Report on the war-revenue bill," of which 25,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 35,000 for the use of the Committee on Finance, and 5,000 for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will object to a resolution providing for the printing of an equal number of the minority report when it is filed?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not in the slightest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Finance, dissenting from the favorable report upon the bill may be permitted to file their views within the next two or three days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that understanding, Mr. President, I submit the following resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 112) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That there be printed 65,000 additional copies of part 2 of Senate Report No. 103, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, entitled "Views of minority members of the Committee on Finance on the war-revenue bill (H. R. 4280)," of which 25,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 35,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Finance, and 5,000 copies for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me for just one statement in this connection, I desire to say, for the information of Senators, that as soon as the conference report now pending before the Senate on the food-control bill is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to make the revenue bill the unfinished business with the view of proceeding to its consideration as soon as possible after the pending bill is disposed of. I do not think, however, that in any event I shall desire to call up the revenue bill for action by the Senate before Wednesday next.

INCOME AND EXCESS PROFITS TAX.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to submit a communication from William S. Shields, president of the City National Bank, of Knoxville, Tenn., bearing upon the subject of the income and excess profits tax, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., August 1, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: After having considered very carefully the Senate Finance Committee bill regarding income and excess profits tax, I have come to the conclusion that as drawn this bill is most unfair and discriminating and one that will work a very great hardship on the majority of the manufacturing, jobbing, and other business interests in the South.

There are some concerns, manufacturers of advertised goods, which made enormous profits during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, owing to cheap labor and low cost of materials, who will not make as much money during 1917 as in any of the three years before the war, as they did not advance their prices in proportion to the advances in material and labor, hence these firms will be eliminated entirely from excess tax, although their net profits for 1917 will still be very large.

Knowing the business men of the South as I do, I know that they do not wish to get out of any of the taxes which are going to be needed to pay the expenses of carrying on this war, but they do not wish to be taxed at from 33⅓ per cent to 60 per cent of their profits during this year on account of having very poor years in 1911, 1912, and 1913, and some other business interests with the same amount of money invested entirely eliminated from this tax simply because they were more fortunate and enjoyed prosperous years during 1911, 1912, and 1913.

From press reports the Government estimates that the excess profits for 1917 will amount to $5,000,000,000, and they wish to raise about $800,000,000 with excess profits tax, which would be about 16 per cent.

Now, if some firms have to pay from 30 per cent to 60 per cent, certain other firms will get out with practically nothing. Therefore it would be much more just and equitable if a straight tax of, say, from 15 per cent to 20 per cent would be taxed on all of the net profits for this year, regardless of what profits were in any previous years. On a 20 per cent basis the Government would realize $1,000,000,000, provided profits were only $5,000,000,000, which is $200,000,000 more than they figure on getting on the present proposed basis.

Not only would this be much more just, but the assessment and collection of these taxes would be nothing like as intricate and would cost the Government a great deal less for its collection than under the present proposed tax, under which I believe there are very few firms who could figure out correctly the amount of taxes due without the assistance of Government experts.

Hoping you can see your way clear to advocate the proposed changes in this bill, I am,

Yours, very truly, W. S. SHIELDS.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 2749) for the relief of George W. Samson; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2750) granting a pension to Algennie Stevens; to the Committee on Pensions.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I stood last spring in the heat of a blazing Arizona sun on the edge of an abyss with a sheer drop of 2,000 feet, gazing at the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, sprawled like a giant asleep in the sun, impressive, dignified, solemn, and inert. It seemed the personification of unintelligent and unconscious repose, and an empty-headed tourist came to toss a bowlder over the brink into the bowels of this sleeping monster.

One week later, under a wintry sky, nipped by an Arctic wind, I stood at the foot of the Yosemite Falls, and watched the water tumbling in great masses 1,700 feet upon an enormous ice cone, while the spray drifted about me and froze to my clothing. The uproar was deafening, ebbing and flowing in an audible flood. An occasional chunk of ice would come hurtling down the cliff face with a rattle like that of a musket. It was electric, pulsing, vigorous, stimulating; it was force personified.

The next day I stood in a grove of gigantic redwoods, upon a 10-foot carpet of snow, in a calm that brooded heavily, 20 miles distant from any other living soul. There was nothing to hear, and nothing to see but the dazzling white of the drifted snow and the dark green of the foliage and the reddish bronze of the giant trunks that reared themselves like sentinels where they had lived since the days of Moses. It was a good place to reflect, and my mind went back to a time 30 years before, when I worked as a laborer in those very mountains, at the princely sum of $50 a month. I reflected that the 30 years that had elapsed since then had brought me some knowledge of the privations of the poor, some knowledge of the pleasures of the rich, some knowledge of the pangs and miseries of poverty, and some knowledge of the softness and ease of luxury; and it seemed to me that it was a wise provision of nature that the years of man should be numbered, lest some shrewd and rapacious individual should acquire control of the whole world and the contents thereof and place all other persons at his service; and I wondered if it were much better that a few shrewd and rapacious individuals should own the greater part of the world and its contents, and hold the majority of their fellow beings at their service.

The conflict between capital and labor in the United States has proceeded for many years. It has been hard fought on both sides, but the rules of warfare have gradually crystallized. We have laws and procedures that prevent one side or the other from committing acts of cruelty or violence toward their opponents, and we have within three years passed the Clayton Act, which guarantees to labor the right to the usual and peaceable methods of the strike. It is to the Clayton Act that I desire at this time to call the attention of the Senate.

Humanity at large seems to me to be like the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, sprawled in slumber, not yet awake to its rights and its opportunities, unintelligent, sleepy, and inert; and I wonder to-day how long it will be before some empty-headed tourist, roaming the face of the earth, will toss a bowlder into the bowels of that part of humanity that labors and awaken it to its real strength, to vitalize and mass the force of human labor and pour it like the falls of the Yosemite into the world's whirlpool, a mobile, intelligent, and dynamic thing. I scarcely expected that the movement would start in Russia, where the Czar was evidently all powerful, where the people were trained to obedience, where the armies were gathered in the field ready to quell insubordination, and where autocracy was firmly intrenched; but one morning we woke and saw by the papers that without a premonitory rumble the empty-headed autocrats of Russia had thrown one bowlder too many into the bowels of the Russian proletariat, and in the twinkling of an eye the autocrats were dethroned, the Czar was banished, and a group of soldiers' and workingmen's delegates were governing imperial Russia.

It would not be strange if the next movement were found in the United States, and I wish to warn those Members of the Senate who take this matter lightly that if it is found in the United States it will be on their heads, and that this bill will be the strike bowlder that the Senate is tossing into the bowels of organized labor in this country. I fancy there are very few Senators who appreciate what is contained in this bill on this point.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if there has been any statement made by anyone as to why this was taken out of the bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not know whether the statement made to me was confidential or not. I think I can fairly treat it as not confidential. I was told that only two members of the Senate conferees voted to sustain this amendment. I then said, "Do they believe that it does not prevent peaceful strikes?" The reply was, "Oh, yes; they believe that it prevents peaceful strikes, but they think that peaceful strikes should be prevented during the war." That was the report as it came to me.

The Constitution of the United States has been a very powerful bulwark to protect the privileges of wealth in the United States; but if the friends of property were wise they would not agitate the matter at this time. They would realize that the time of war is a time when the passions of men are easily stirred. They would realize that the safe conduct of this war depends upon the frame of mind of the laboring men in this country. England has found it so; Russia has found it so; and the one thing that we are hoping for to end the war is that the workingmen of Germany will no longer obey the constituted authorities. Yet in this country, where organized labor has been patriotic, where it has been helpful, where there is no need of having any friction whatever, the Congress of the United States deliberately writes into a food-control bill more stringent provisions than are found in the Sherman Antitrust Act, under which the Danbury hatters have recently been obliged to pay a quarter of a million dollars to their employers.

The Senate of the United States is not empty headed. It is composed of men of patriotism and honor and intelligence. The Senate is sometimes heedless; the Senate sometimes tosses a bowlder or two; but when the Senate faces a proposition, and if it will face this proposition and see how serious it is, the Senate believes in doing the right thing.

Sane-minded leaders are finding it all too difficult at this time to direct labor in sane channels. The draft riots are ominous symptoms. The lynching of an I. W. W. leader in a Northern State within a few days has set a bowlder to running that is not likely to come to rest at an early date.

To toss this bowlder into the vitals of labor at this time is the most serious thing that capital could possibly do, and I beg the Senate not to do it. If the flood of labor is once loosed, those who are bound to the trees at the foot of the falls will find themselves drenched with freezing spray, and their doom will be certain. We can not live a few weeks in this country, any of us, if labor refuses to allow us to be fed.

Now I want to show the Senate just what is in this bill, and I want to appeal to them to set it right, and to set it right before it is too late.

I think at this point I ought to disclaim any intention of filibustering on the acceptance of this report. I feel, in justice to myself, that I ought to make my attitude very plain, but I have no sympathy with filibustering at any time, and particularly I should not filibuster against this bill, because I believe it is a good bill with the exception of this one amendment which has been cut from it.

I have nothing against Mr. Hoover. I have never met Mr. Hoover personally. If his publicity bureau attacked me for the part I took in helping to frame a bill that could pass the Senate by a substantial vote, I am sorry that it did it, but I am not opposing the adoption of this report because of anything that Mr. Hoover or his bureau said about me. I believe that Mr. Hoover is a very able, a very honest, and a very notable man. I am anxious that the United States should capitalize his reputation and get the greatest amount of good from it. I am not as sanguine about some provisions of the bill as others are. I believe that Mr. Hoover will make economy fashionable in the household, and anything that makes household economy fashionable in this country is a tremendous blessing.

If I had my way, I should adhere to the commission of three, and I should do that for Mr. Hoover's benefit. Mr. Hoover is evidently unused to politics, and he has allowed his enthusiasm to carry him further than I should wish in some cases. I think if his identity were somewhat submerged in a commission of three it would be a protection to Mr. Hoover. I believe that the work of the commission would be more valuable to this country than the work of any one man who can be pointed to as a food dictator, and if Mr. Hoover is the one man in control of this presidential bureau he will be the man who will be attacked and criticized whenever anything goes wrong. Therefore, I should have been pleased if the commission of three had been retained, but I am attacking the report of this conference committee as a whole, because the rules of the Senate will not permit anything else. The rules of the Senate are such that when the House and Senate conferees meet and make a report we must accept that report in toto or reject it in toto. We can not instruct the Senate conferees as to amendments that the Senate has passed. We might instruct them to accept amendments coming from the other House. Therefore, as friendly as I am to the bill, as hard as I have worked to make a bill that would be acceptable to a majority of the Senate and do the work, I am, under the parliamentary situation, compelled to oppose the report and vote for its rejection. That attitude I regret very much.

Now, I will draw attention directly to the part of the bill that is so dangerous. It is found in section 4, which is known as the provision against hoarding.

Section 4 makes it a criminal offense, punishable by imprisonment not exceeding two years, for any person to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessary. That is, if the president and secretary of a labor union send out a notice for a peaceable strike on any railroad engaged in transporting necessaries, or in any factory engaged in producing necessaries, or in any warehouse engaged in storing necessaries, a warrant may be sworn out against them, and they may be imprisoned for two years or fined $10,000.

I do not believe that was the intention of the men who drew this act; I believe they overlooked it; but I found exactly the same situation in the priority of shipments bill. It was there provided that any person who did anything to obstruct or retard interstate commerce should be criminally liable and should be put in prison. I got the amendment that I offered to this bill adopted on the priority of shipments bill. It was adopted by the Senate and concurred in by the House and it is in the conference report.

There is no possible excuse for adopting that amendment on the railroad-shipment bill and not adopting it on a food-control bill. There is not as much excuse, because this bill was framed primarily to give to laboring men cheaper food. Whether it will give them cheaper food is debatable. But there is one thing certain, that it takes away from them the right to employ the peaceful and recognized methods of the industrial strike.

I wish to read an item which appeared in yesterday's Washington Post. It shows the temper of the country, and it shows how we have disregarded it. I read from the Washington Post of August 5:

RITES MAY CAUSE RIOT—BUTTE WAITS TENSELY FOR SLAIN I. W. W.'S FUNERAL TO-DAY—HAYWOOD ORDER PORTENTOUS—NATIONAL LEADER ORDERS LYNCHED MAN BURIED ON "FIGHTING GROUND"—4,000 EXPECTED TO FOLLOW VIGILANTES' VICTIM TO GRAVE SIDE—CARMEN'S STRIKE ADDS TO GRAVITY.

BUTTE, MONT., August 4.

Perched high among her copper hills, the picturesque mining town of Butte was to-night waiting, tense, for the developments that to-morrow may bring.

Torn with dissatisfaction, strike, labor troubles, lawlessness, near-rioting, the city wondered to-night if the funeral of Frank W. Little, Industrial Workers of the World executive, will be the spark that will set aflame the smoldering tinderbox of hatred.

Four thousand Industrial Workers of the World are expected to follow the body of the vigilantes' victim to the grave.

The plan to bury Little near his home in Oklahoma was altered because of a telegram from W. D. Haywood, national secretary of the Industrial Workers of the World, reading: "Bury the body on the fighting ground." Arrangements were made at once for the burial of Little in a Butte cemetery.

NO MINISTER TO TAKE PART.

Death masks and photographs were made to-day of Little, who was lynched here Wednesday morning. The funeral services will be in charge of the Industrial Workers of the World. No minister will take part, it was said.

Troops here to guard the mines since America entered the war probably prevented actual violence following the finding of Little's body dangling at the end of a rope from a railway bridge Thursday morning.

CARMEN NOW ON STRIKE.

Excitement was allayed by the reaction which followed, and miners flocked back to work. Conditions were apparently approaching normal when, on advice from Haywood, the industrialists changed their plans and announced that a public funeral and demonstration would attend burial of Little's body. This development, coupled with a walkout to-day of all street-car men, again created chaos.

Another angle which promised possibilities of developing a riot was the invitation issued to-night by those in charge of the funeral arrangements for the entire membership of the Pearse-Connolly Club to attend in a body. The membership of the organization is made up of sympathizers of Irish independence, most of them openly anti-English.

RAILROAD MEN CAUSE EXCITEMENT.

Four railroad men carrying a rope near the scene of the trestle from which Little was lynched threw the city into excitement early to-day.

Two automobile loads of policemen, armed with rifles, went to the scene and scoured the neighborhood in the belief that another lynching was in progress. The railroad men, however, soon convinced the officers that they were at the trestle on legitimate business.

In the adjoining column there is a news dispatch from Oklahoma:

Two men are killed in Oklahoma draft riots; North Carolinians arming; Georgia slackers active; posses gather at Sasakwa for final blow at mobs in hills—

And so on.

In the same edition of the Washington Post, in the Post of yesterday, I find the following:

SLASH IN COAL PRICES—WILSON AND CABINET TAKE STEPS TO CUT HIGH COST OF LIVING—AT BOTTOM OF LABOR TROUBLES—STRIKE CONCILIATORS SAY DISPUTES BEGIN WITH EXPENSES OF LIVELIHOOD—ADMINISTRATION EAGER TO HAVE FOOD-CONTROL BILL PASSED—REDUCTIONS PROMISED THOSE DISGRUNTLED.

Slashing reductions in the price of coal may be expected within a week. They will come none too soon to ease the mind of President Wilson and his Cabinet advisers, who are more gravely concerned at the moment with the relation between the high cost of living and labor unrest than with any other war problem.

I pause to remark that that is distinctly so. The big problems that are engaging the attention of the administration at this time are labor problems. If any member of the Senate thinks that strikes should be prohibited, let him introduce a bill in the Senate and refer it not to the Committee on Agriculture, but to the Committee on Education and Labor. Let us consider the matter and find out just what the facts are and report a bill that will meet the difficulty as it exists. That is a very different thing from accepting a bill for food control from the Committee on Agriculture and letting it slip through with this very drastic provision, and you have not even the excuse of ignorance, because I called it to the attention of the Senate and made a short speech on the subject the day the amendment was offered. The Senate adopted the amendment without a division, and they had the right to believe that the conferees would adhere to it in the conference. I continue to read:

In its cost investigations the Federal Trade Commission has found that high coal costs are the basis of almost every other high cost.

HIGH COST CAUSES LABOR UNREST.

The Labor Department has found high living costs at the bottom of every one of the labor troubles which it has succeeded in temporizing during the last month.

I comment again. Those gentlemen in easy circumstances who say that strikes should be prohibited during the war do not understand the situation. They may have in mind the strike of the switchmen at Chicago last month. I want to tell you how that strike arose. There has been for some years past a provision that railroad employees who are addicted to intoxicating liquor shall be discharged. The railroad brotherhood have accepted that rule, known as Rule G, and various railroad men have been discharged for intoxication. The principal reason for this switchmen's strike the other day was that the railroad took back two men who had been discharged for intoxication and put them in as foremen over temperate men who had been in the service of the railroad all the time. Is there anyone in the Senate who thinks so poorly of labor that he would not want the men to have the right to strike when the railroad undertook to put that sort of a thing over on them?

It is because the country faces the most serious industrial disturbances unless living costs are reduced that the administration is so vigorous in its insistence on the passage of the food-control bill and the prosecution of the Trade Commission s cost investigations—

That is, the administration is anxious to put this food-control bill through so as to lower the cost of living for laboring men, and at the same time there has crept into the bill a provision which will prevent laboring men from striking to force their wages up in proportion to the higher cost of living. Continuing:

The importance of this matter can hardly be minimized.

Secretary Wilson has said the whole industrial unrest is due to the high cost of living.

The workman whose pay envelope formerly provided his month's rent, his living bills, and a dollar or two over now finds himself hard put to it to pay for the barest necessities. In each instance of labor trouble which the Labor Department has investigated within the last month it has found this condition at the bottom of the trouble.

The conciliators of the department have so far been able to persuade the workingmen to keep on at their tasks, but in every instance they have held out the promise of a reduction of living costs. Should this fail to be effected, the situation would be nationally serious.

MUST PREVENT HIGH RENTS.

The Labor Department is already in possession of information warranting the most serious concern on this score. Last winter, when coal prices soared, landlords throughout the country sought to raise rents. They are already planning to meet this situation ahead of time this year when leases are renewed in October.

The Labor Department is extremely anxious that the coal determination be made before this time, for universal increases of rents then would stir up trouble.

I now wish to read from an editorial in the Washington Post of August 1, putting the matter very fairly. It is entitled "Labor concessions."

Large concessions must be made by organized labor if American industries are to be brought to maximum strength after the National Army has been organized.

I agree to that. The administration is already calling on organized labor to make large concessions, and in the same breath with which it asks for those concessions it removes from the laboring men the guaranteed right to peacefully strike that we gave them less than three years ago. No business man would make large concessions when his rights to bare existence are denied him in the same breath. I continue:

There are to be no general exemptions at the coal mines, the shipyards, or in the war industries. The case of each individual will be considered on its merits. If a man can be replaced in an industry, he will go into the Army.

In making replacements the industries will be seriously hampered unless organized labor gives its complete cooperation. If the unions take a stand against the employment of unskilled men or men who are not members of the unions, there will be no opportunity for replacements without incurring the danger of strikes.

Unskilled men will have to be trained to fill the places of skilled men yielded by industry to the Army. The foremen and trained workmen will be called upon to train the newcomers. Without their cooperation the gaps can not be filled

It is essential to success in war that all the basic industries and the munitions factories should increase their productive capacity. It will not be sufficient to maintain them at their present capacity. Nevertheless, even though these industries are working below capacity now, many of their men will be taken by the Government for the Army, and the problem of replacement looms large.

Only by the whole-souled cooperation of the American Federation of Labor and the patriotic zeal of every workman in the country can the needs of the Nation be met.

In the administration act organized labor is to be met in the spirit of wholesome and hearty cooperation, and at the same time this bill is passed that takes away from the workingman the only chance he has to force a living wage.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is making in my judgment an exceedingly strong point on this particular phase of the proposed legislation. I desire to ask him if he can inform the Senate as to what statutes or regulations, if any, with respect to the right of strike have been enacted by Great Britain during this war? I will say, in following up my question, I have understood that organized labor in Great Britain has made great concessions, as the Senator has indicated organized labor should make here, and that also employers in Great Britain have made concessions, and the Government stood between with its authority and succeeded in getting some sort of an agreement to meet the conditions of labor and the different difficulties that ordinarily would arise in time of peace. I was wondering if the Senator has any information with respect to the right of strike in Great Britain during the war.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have complete information carefully compiled, edited at an expense of several thousand dollars by some public-spirited citizens of my State. I presented it to the Senate about a month ago. It has been pending before the Committee on Printing ever since. I have attended at four or five different times set for a hearing. I have been unable to get a majority of the committee present to consider the matter, and those who have been present have been unwilling to allow me to poll the committee, although I know that a large majority are in favor of printing it. I wanted it printed so that I might use it for this speech. I have been unable to get action from the Committee on Printing. There is a great mass of material giving the labor laws as to industry and transportation, giving the experience of England as to how the law has worked; it is upon the table of the Committee on Printing and I can not get action. I wish that I might answer the Senator more directly. It is there, it is available, but I do not know what it is, because I have not been able to look at the manuscript.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. A few minutes ago the Senator from New Hampshire made a statement which I intended to ask a question about, but I was called from the Chamber. As long as he is interrupted now I wish to ask him under what circumstances two men were employed by a railroad or railroads in Chicago, who had been discharged or were accused of the excessive use of intoxicants and made foremen and placed over men who were temperate? Ordinarily railroads will not employ men who use intoxicants to excess or in many cases use them at all. It is a remarkable statement which I think might well be explained.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, before he answers the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, inasmuch as reference has been made to the Committee on Printing, and I was for some time the chairman of that committee and am still a member of it, I think it is fair to state that I have been present at the meetings at which this document has been submitted for consideration, and I have been in favor of printing it, but some of the members of the committee have been necessarily absent, and it has been very difficult to get a quorum of the committee present. There was a meeting called for this morning for the consideration of this very subject, but on account of the absence from the city of some of the members and the absence on business of others, we were unable to get a quorum. I think the committee will act on the matter as soon as we can get a quorum. That is the situation, and I wish to say that, as far as I am concerned, there has not been any neglect or default on my part.

Mr. HOLLIS. What the Senator from Florida says is absolutely true. He has been present at every meeting, and he has done everything possible to get a favorable report. I know that. I said what I did say very much as the minister in church always scolds those who are present because of the absentees. But it is an important matter, and I wish that the committee would take enough interest to get that English experience series printed.

Now, returning to what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] said, the railroads did inaugurate Rule G providing that a man who was addicted to the use of intoxicating liquor should be discharged. The railroad brotherhood have accepted that rule. They do not object to it. These men were discharged because they used intoxicating liquors to excess; but I can not explain the fact any more than to say that the two men were reemployed by the railroad in violation of that rule, and were not only reemployed, but were put in as foremen over the heads of men who had remained on the pay roll in good standing all the time. I do not know why the railroad company did it except——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield further to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield further.

Mr. WEEKS. Can the Senator inform the Senate what road it was?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; I can not inform the Senate. It was stated in the newspapers which railroad it was. I have forgotten. All the names sound alike to me.

Mr. WEEKS. The statement is so remarkable in its character and so contrary to the general policy of railroads that it seems there must be some circumstances relating to it of which the Senator from New Hampshire has not been informed.

Mr. HOLLIS. There is the difficulty. Whenever there is a strike it is always assumed that the employers are all right, especially if they are a railroad, and the men are all wrong. That is exactly the point I was trying to emphasize. To say that I do not believe in strikes in war time is to say nothing. You believe in strikes that are justified, but you do not believe in strikes that are not justified. The only way to determine whether a strike is justified or not is to inaugurate a strike and have an investigation and then public opinion will back that part of the strike which is right.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. My attention was diverted for a moment. The question propounded by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] did the Senator from New Hampshire answer fully? I think he asked what the legislation of Great Britain is upon this subject and whether there had been any modification of it during the present war.

Mr. HOLLIS. I did not answer it because I do not know what the answer is. It is contained in the manuscript I presented to the Committee on Printing, and I hope it will be printed, so that we may all see it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have some information upon that subject, although it may not be entirely accurate.

Mr. HOLLIS. I would be glad if the Senator would give it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know what the legislation of Great Britain was prior to the beginning of the war. It is much more advanced and much more favorable to organized labor than any legislation of the United States. The statute of Great Britain provides practically that the law of conspiracy, so far as labor disputes are concerned, is repealed and that it shall be lawful for two or more to do anything with regard to labor disputes that it is lawful for a single individual to do. That is about as broad and general an emancipation from the law of conspiracy as it is possible to conceive.

That statute remains unimpaired, as I am informed, except as it is affected by the Government ownership and operation of certain industries. The impairment is simply the implied impairment which grows out of the disinclination of men to strike while they are in the service of the Government.

I do not believe, so far as private employment is concerned, the statute to which I have referred has been in any wise modified or changed. I have given some little attention to the matter, and therefore I venture to make this suggestion. The last observation is, of course, not the result of a complete examination of all the statutes of Great Britain since the war began, but I have examined the general war regulations of Great Britain sufficiently to be reasonably sure that the statute has not been amended in any way.

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator for his contribution to this discussion.

I will now read the last paragraph of the editorial I was reading some time ago:

> No better opportunity has ever been presented to the labor forces of America to give the world an example of patriotism. In England and France labor has responded loyally. There is every reason to believe that American labor will meet the test with characteristic patriotism.

I think no one will accuse the Washington Post of being unduly favorable to the claims of organized labor. I think its statements are fair; I think they are moderate; and when American labor is meeting the test with all the decency and patriotism of which it is capable, when it is doing it with such a high cost of living that the actual wages received by labor are 25 or 30 per cent less than they were two years ago, it is a slap in the face for the Congress of the United States to withdraw from labor under this bill the right to strike by peaceable methods.

Organized labor has been very much ignored by the administration so far in this war. No member of organized labor has been put upon the committee on railroads of the Council of National Defense. No member of organized labor has been put upon the committee on coal or any of the other of those special committees. It is true that after the first organization a special committee on labor was organized, with Mr. Gompers at the head, but they have no way of engaging with the other committees that really do business.

Mr. Gompers has behaved in the most high-minded and patriotic way throughout this war. He is having his troubles and he will have his troubles, particularly if this bill goes through without the labor amendment that I offered and which the Senate adopted.

Last fall both political parties were very anxious to get the labor vote. Speeches were made by the candidates showing that they were in favor of allowing labor to strike by peaceful means. President Wilson in his Shadow Lawn speech said:

> The time has not yet come in this country when a man will be compelled by force to continue to work in any capacity.

The President is not asking now for any legislation to prevent peaceful strikes. He has had a chance to do so several times during this session of Congress. The bill to prohibit strikes on railroads was up for consideration by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. No message came to me that the President desired to have it passed. The President made a speech at Philadelphia not very long ago in which he reiterated his belief in the right of labor to strike to improve the condition of labor and to increase its wages. When the priority of shipments bill was before the Senate and this matter was up for discussion no message came from the President saying that he wanted it. The reply made then, when I called attention to that bill, was that it really did not prohibit strikes. It was agreed to here because Senators did not believe in prohibiting peaceful strikes, but they did not believe that bill did it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Because of my very intense interest in what the Senator is saying, and because of my sympathy with the position that he takes, I wish to ask him if he has examined at all a bill that has recently been introduced—Senate bill 2734—and if he is familiar with the purpose of that particular bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not know what the bill is. Will the Senator read the title?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It is a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917.

The portion of it that is determinative is section 6a:

> The President in time of war, or in the event of any other emergency which in his opinion justifies such action, may, by proclamation, prohibit all persons, not authorized by proper agents of the Government to do so, from entering upon places which the President may in said proclamation designate, classify, or describe as of importance in connection with the national defense, or from loitering within such distance thereof as he may prescribe.

Then follows the penal clause.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am not familiar with the bill; it has not been brought to my attention; but I wish to say that the bill did not contain a tenth part of the danger that this bill does. The bill that the Senator has read is an administrative bill, to be administered by the President. He will be the one to say where loitering would not be permitted, where interference would not be permitted. He could exercise his humane judgment on the question. But the bill we are passing to-day is a bill that makes it a criminal offense for laboring men to engage in the usual peaceful method of a strike. Anyone can go to a justice of the peace and swear out a warrant and have such a man prosecuted and put in prison. It does not need the President or the administration to set the wheels turning. Any employer of labor may have a strike stopped instantly by merely threatening the labor union that he will invoke the penal clause if the strike is ordered.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator say that the bill could be enforced locally?

Mr. HOLLIS. I think it would be enforced locally. I do not know why not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I doubt that.

Mr. HOLLIS. I was not speaking of the procedure. I have not had the benefit of criminal practice myself, and I do not know a different method by which they would get at it without waiting for the President to inaugurate proceedings.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it the opinion of the Senator that the conferees thought the language to which he is directing his remarks would have the effect he speaks of?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; the reason given to me was that the conferees believed that peaceful strikes should be prohibited during the war. That is all the satisfaction I got.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is not that entirely new matter in this bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; it was in the bill that came from the House. It is in section 4. It is the provision against hoarding.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New Hampshire introduced that amendment, and it was agreed to by the Senate and was stricken out in conference.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I was obliged to be out, and I did not hear that part of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know who made that statement to the Senator as to what transpired in the conference. I do not remember having heard that statement at all.

Mr. HOLLIS. Was the Senator present when this was acted on?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was not present at the time. The statement may have been made, but in discussing it with some members of the conference committee with whom I talked, they expressed the opinion that it was not necessary to retain it in the bill; but there was no statement made at any time, in my hearing, that peaceful striking ought to be prohibited during time of war. I never heard that intimated until the suggestion was made here.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not know how far we have a right to go into the deliberations of committees of conference, but I can not find anyone yet who voted to strike out my amendment. I have not been able to find a member of the committee who was willing to father that action.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I stated that if I had been there I might have voted to recede in order to reach an agreement. I just happened to be out for a moment. I will state my views about the matter when the Senator is through.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I hope that some member of the conference committee will rise in the Senate and give some excuse, feeble though it may be, for rejecting this amendment. I have not heard such action defended. I have not heard of anyone who voted against the amendment, and I can not find anyone. I should be ashamed to admit, if I had been on the conference committee, that I voted to strike the amendment out.

Labor has been pretty hard hit under this war. I have already once related to the Senate an experience I had during the last campaign in Manchester, N. H., the only city of any size in the State. I was there to make a political speech and I was waited upon by 15 or 20 men and women, who asked me to use my influence to get the troops sent back from the Mexican border as soon as possible. I went down and talked to each one individually. There was not a professional man or a business man among them. They were laboring people—respectable people, neat-appearing people, but laboring people. Every one of them had a husband or a son or brother upon whom he or she was dependent. That was before we became involved in the war. These poor people were actually starving for the necessaries of life away back last October when this Nation, richer than it had ever been before, was going right along about its regular business—"business as usual." It was borne in upon me then with greater force than ever before that the pains and sufferings of war fall with crushing effect on poor people; those who are right on the fringe of existence.

However, we passed the selective-draft bill. I was in favor of it. I was in favor of it because it would compel the rich to fight their part of the war the same as the poor people; but it is hard to make the poor people, when they see that they constitute nine-tenths of those drafted, believe that the burden is fairly imposed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, bearing on that subject, I desire to say that I have before me a bulletin of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, whole number 222, on the subject of "Hours, Fatigue, and Health in British Munition Factories." The bulletin states "that treasury agreement as to trade-union rules affecting restriction of output—conference at the British treasury, March 17, 18, 19, 1915." It also sets out the proposals agreed upon as the result of the conference. It is not very long, and I believe, if the Senator from New Hampshire would allow, it would be quite appropriate to have it inserted here. It only comprises a page and a half of the bulletin I hold in my hand.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should be glad to have the Senator ask that that should be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the conference were David Lloyd-George, Walter Runciman, and Arthur Henderson, chairman of workmen's representatives; also William Moses, secretary of workmen's representatives. The first article provides:

During the war period there shall in no case be any stoppage of work upon munitions and equipments of war or other work required for a satisfactory completion of the war.

Then, there are other provisions which bear directly on the subject under consideration. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask to have inserted in the RECORD these proposals agreed upon as the result of the conference with the English Government, together with the names appended to the agreement.

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall be very glad to have that done by the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PROPOSALS AGREED UPON AS RESULT OF THE CONFERENCE.

I. During the war period there shall in no case be any stoppage of work upon munitions and equipments of war or other work required for a satisfactory completion of the war.

All differences on wages or conditions of employment arising out of the war shall be dealt with without stoppage in accordance with paragraph II.

Questions not arising out of the war should not be made the cause of stoppage during the war period.

II. Subject to any existing agreements or methods now prevailing for the settlement of disputes, differences of a purely individual or local character shall, unless mutually arranged, be the subject of a deputation to the firm representing the workmen concerned; and differences of a general character affecting wages and conditions of employment arising out of the war shall be the subject of conferences between the parties.

In all cases of failure to reach a settlement of disputes by the parties directly concerned or their representatives or under existing agreements, the matter in dispute shall be dealt with under any one of the three following alternatives as may be mutually agreed or, in default of agreement, settled by the board of trade:

(a) The committee on production.

(b) A single arbitrator agreed upon by the parties or appointed by the board of trade.

(c) A court of arbitration upon which labor is represented equally with the employers.

III. An advisory committee representative of the organized workers engaged in production for Government requirements shall be appointed by the Government for the purpose of facilitating the carrying out of these recommendations and for consultation by the Government or by the workmen concerned.

IV. Provided that the conditions set out in paragraph V are accepted by the Government as applicable to all contracts for the execution of war munitions and equipments, the workmen's representatives at the conference are of opinion that during the war period the relaxation of the present trade practices is imperative, and that each union be recommended to take into favorable consideration such changes in working conditions or trade customs as may be necessary with a view to accelerating the output of war munitions or equipments.

V. The recommendations contained in paragraph IV are conditional on the Government requiring all contractors and subcontractors engaged on munitions and equipments of war or other work required for the satisfactory completion of the war to give an undertaking to the following effect:

Any departure during the war from the practice ruling in our workshops, shipyards, and other industries prior to the war shall only be for the period of the war.

No change in practice made during the war shall be allowed to prejudice the position of the work people in our employment or of their trade-unions in regard to the resumption and maintenance after the war of any rules or customs existing prior to the war.

In any readjustment of staff which may have to be effected after the war, priority of employment will be given to workmen in our employment at the beginning of the war who are serving with the colors or who are now in our employment.

Where the custom of a shop is changed during the war by the introduction of semiskilled men to perform work hitherto performed by a class of workmen of higher skill, the rates paid shall be the usual rates of the district for that class of work.

The relaxation of existing demarcation restrictions or admission of semiskilled or female labor shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job. In cases where men who ordinarily do the work are adversely affected thereby the necessary readjustments shall be made so that they can maintain their previous earnings.

A record of the nature of the departure from the conditions prevailing before the date of this undertaking shall be kept, and shall be open for inspection by the authorized representative of the Government.

Due notice shall be given to the workmen concerned, wherever practicable, of any changes of working conditions which it is desired to introduce as the result of this arrangement, and opportunity of local consultation with men or their representatives shall be given if desired.

All differences with our workmen engaged on Government work arising out of changes so introduced, or with regard to wages or conditions of employment arising out of the war, shall be settled without stoppage of work, in accordance with the procedure laid down in Paragraph II.

It is clearly understood that, except as expressly provided in the fourth paragraph of Clause V, nothing in this undertaking is to prejudice the position of employers and employees after the war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber during the first part of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, and doubtless he has covered the ground that will be embraced in my question; but, with his indulgence, I should like to submit this interrogation to him: Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to contend that under the language found in section 4 of the bill as reported by the conference committee—and I will read it after I conclude the sentence—employees, whether members of labor unions or not, would be prevented from striking? The language to which I refer is as follows:

To conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries.

Is that the language which the Senator from New Hampshire contends would prevent a strike; and if a strike were had, would subject the striking employees to the pains and penalties provided in the bill?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, that is the language. That language does not in terms prohibit a strike, but it does render liable to State prison any two officials of a labor union who arrange with each other to call a strike in any of these specified industries; and if the officials of the labor union can not arrange for a strike, that prevents the efficient use of a strike.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, it would seem to me that, taking into consideration the subject matter of the legislation and the object of the same, and also keeping in view the preceding language of section 4 and also the concluding part of the same section, it is reasonably certain that it does not cover employees; it seems clear to me that the object of this section is not to reach those who may be employees or those who might participate in a strike. The preceding part of the same section indicates that the section is aimed to prevent hoarding and monopolies in respect to the things therein referred to; to prevent discriminatory and unfair deceptive or wasteful practices; to prevent unjust or any unreasonable rates or charges in handling or dealing in or with any of the commodities denominated "necessaries" that are covered by the bill. The punctuation and construction of the sentence must be considered. It will be observed that there is no period following the declared purposes of the section, but immediately following the language to which I have just referred, the words "to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing," and so forth, would seem to be limited entirely by the context and would apply only to those acts referred to which are denominated offenses. I have very hastily read the section, but do not believe that any court would construe it as preventing employees from striking, or would subject them to pains and penalties if they should combine to strike.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, exactly the same argument as the distinguished Senator from Utah has just made was made on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the other House when the Sherman Antitrust Act was passed. Let me remind the Senator that the Sherman Antitrust Act was passed not to prevent strikes but to prevent monopolies. It was supposed it would prevent manufacturers and railroads from conspiring to raise the price of the necessities of life. No one dreamed that any lawyer would be ingenious enough to torture the language of the Sherman Antitrust Act into such form as would prevent labor organizations carrying out their legitimate functions, but I believe the very first time it was sought to impose the terms of that law it was done against labor unions and not against the monopolists it was intended to curb.

If the distinguished Senator from Utah were to be the judge before whom I should have to come for violating the terms of this proposed statute, I should have great hope that I would get a square deal and might stay out of jail, but unfortunately the Senator is in the Senate, and I might come before a judge who had very different ideas. Being an humble laboring man, I would very much rather have a provision in the bill to place the matter beyond doubt.

Let me suggest to the Senator, if the bill means what he says it does, that I do not see any harm at all in allowing my amendment to stay in.

Mr. KING. In reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, I will say that if I had been on the conference committee I should have insisted that the provision remain in the bill. If I thought the bill were susceptible of the construction which the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire places upon it, I should vote against the report, and I may vote against it anyway, for that reason and other reasons.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am very much encouraged by what the Senator from Utah says. I am sure that if he had been on the commitee of conference he would have voted to retain this amendment. I am sure if the members of that conference were to meet to-day they would retain it. They did not know what they were doing; they did not think; they did not realize.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I do not know that I share the sanguine faith expressed by the Senator from New Hampshire in the conferees. I rose really to express my regret that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was not a member of the conference committee. I rather think that the Senate conferees might have tattooed on their foreheads the word "recede" that all who run may read it—I will not say a sort of mark of Cain. However, I wish to say further, while I am on my feet, that a House member of the conference committee did say that they wanted nothing in the bill to permit strikes, and that they wanted to prevent strikes in time of war. So I think perhaps there was a good deal of premeditation on the part of certain conferees in connection with the very point which the Senator is now urging upon the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is not very much in this conference report that the Senator from Oklahoma thinks is right. As a matter of fact, while he is tattooing into the foreheads of Senators who receded the word "recede," there might be tattooed in the Senator's forehead and in the foreheads of some others the word "obstruct."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield

Mr. GORE. I should like to say, Mr. President, that the food-survey bill reached the Senate on May 29. It was immediately referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which I am chairman. That committee was immediately assembled upon my call. The bill was immediately reported to the Senate, and the bill passed the Senate on June 1, the third day after it came to this body from the House of Representatives. I say that not only to vindicate myself—that is of but little consequence—but in order to vindicate the Senate against the imputation of delay.

On the morning of June 15 the President requested me to call upon him at the White House. I did so. He stated that it was his desire that the food-control bill should proceed to consideration in both bodies simultaneously, in the interest of economizing time. I suggested that the bill was not an eligible bill to originate in the Senate. It contained a taxing clause, and, in order to be a valid law, it must originate in the House of Representatives. I assured him, however, that I had no disposition to delay the consideration of the measure. I told him that I could not vote for the bill, but that I had no purpose whatever to obstruct its immediate consideration.

That morning I came to the Capitol and telephoned the Senator from Oregon, suggesting that he introduce the bill that day. He did introduce the bill on June 15. I called the Senate Committee on Agriculture to meet the next morning, and, without changing a word in the bill, it was reported to the Senate on June 16. Sir, was that obstruction?

I did not use the stiletto; I did not fight from ambush; I fought in the open field. The day I reported the bill to the Senate I asked the Senator from Oregon to assume the management of the measure on the floor. I stated to the Senate that I thought the management of the bill ought to be intrusted to friendly hands. Much as I was opposed to the measure, I was not willing to be myself liable to the suspicion of mismanagement or of an attempt to murder the measure under the false show of friendship.

On June 23 the House of Representatives passed the food-control bill. On June 25 the bill came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I appointed a subcommittee that afternoon to consider the measure. The subcommittee deliberated all day on June 26, and on the morning of June 27 I assembled the entire committee, and the committee reported the bill to the Senate the selfsame day. I ask the Senator from Oregon was that obstruction?

Much more consideration could have been given that measure, and with infinite profit. On July 10 the Senator from Oregon asked unanimous consent to take a vote on the measure on July 21. Any one Senator could have objected. It was a request for unanimous consent. I could have objected; any obstructionist could have objected. I interposed no objection. Whatever delay occurred between that date and the vote was incident to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. President, I was opposed to this measure. I was in favor of the Senate amendments. I thought the measure was immeasurably improved by the deliberations of the Senate and by the amendments which were adopted in the Senate; that it was rendered infinitely better and infinitely less liable to objection than it was when it came to this body from the House of Representatives. I immediately assembled the conference committee, and on no occasion did I interpose the slightest delay, the slightest obstruction to their meeting, and to the continuous consideration of that measure in conference.

The imputation of obstruction can not be laid at my door. I think it would have been wise to have retained many of the Senate amendments. They were stricken from the measure over my protest. In the conference I regarded myself not merely as a Senator but as the agent, as the delegate, as the representative of the Senate. I felt that I ought to retain in the measure the deliberate will of the Senate as expressed here by repeated votes and by overwhelming majorities. I did not recede; I did not betray the trust committed to me by this body. I did take charge of the conference committee. I felt then and I feel now that I was quite as well qualified to represent the Senate, its wishes, and its amendments as the Senator from Oregon, who had favored the measure without the Senate amendments. The history and results of the conference justifies this confidence and this conclusion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there are two ways to obstruct. One is by the use of a bludgeon, and the other is by the use of a stiletto. It is true, as the Senator says, that when this bill was introduced in the Senate it was introduced by me at his request, but there has not been a time since I did so that the distinguished chairman of the committee has not used a stiletto on the bill whenever he had an opportunity to do so. I say that without unkindness, but I say it is true just the same.

The Senator speaks of having referred this bill to the subcommittee on a certain date and that the subcommittee was called together at his request. After he had done me the honor to place me in charge of the bill, and after a majority of the members of the committee had signed a call for a full meeting of the full committee to consider it, he refused positively, and appointed and called the subcommittee of which he speaks together—one, too, of his own choosing.

Mr. President, not only is that the case, but while the bill was committed by him to my charge on the floor of the Senate, because he was opposed to it, the Senator absolutely maintained control of the committee; and when the conference committee was appointed, if you please, the Senator undertook to name the members of the conference to suit himself and his views, out of the usual order and contrary to the manner of appointment under the practice of the Senate. Then when the conferees met the chairman of the committee, although he was known to be hostile to the bill, although it was known by me and other members of the committee that he opposed it from the time it was introduced until this very moment, took charge of the conference as chairman of the committee and obstructed in every way possible the prompt consideration of the bill.

I say these things, Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator that because some of the Senate conferees, after having sat for a week in an effort to agree upon a bill and to sustain the amendments put on by the Senate, following the rules of this conference and all other conferences between the two bodies, finally receded in order to reach an agreement, after having been in conference from Thursday until Wednesday—that because some of the Senate conferees who were anxious to get this bill before Congress for action in compliance with the demands of the people of the country and of the President, who is responsible for the conduct of this war, they must forsooth have branded on their foreheads the word "recede."

Mr. President, I had rather be charged with following in the footsteps of the distinguished President of the United States in the conduct of this war, crawling, if you please, on hands and knees in order to win the same, than to stand in opposition to him and to be continually consorting, conspiring, and treating with the enemies of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

To those Senators who have been opposing the President not only in reference to raising an Army but in properly supplying it I will say that their illustrious example is being followed by men in humbler walks of life, opposing the selective draft, and all measures for properly raising and equipping an army, resulting in some States in riot and bloodshed.

Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate now to end this discussion at the earliest possible moment and put this bill through, so that, for good or evil, it may find a place on the statute books and that the President may have an opportunity to undertake to put it into execution.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think there is no way in which I could emphasize the very strong feeling I have as to the provision of this bill now under discussion than by objecting to the adoption of this conference report. I believe it is the first time I have every opposed anything that the administration has wanted. I lay myself open to the imputation in the press of the country of obstructing the passage of the food bill, although I dare say that there is no man on the floor of the Senate who has helped to advance it any more than I have. Therefore, Mr. President, it does emphasize the spirit that moves me to object to the elimination of this special provision from this bill. I do it not because of any preconceived notions of my own but because I am absolutely certain it will lead to serious trouble, serious trouble that we might well avoid, serious trouble that ought not to be fomented by a provision of this kind, particularly after the attention of the Senate and of the country has been called to it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator read the language of the amendment which he proposed when the bill was under consideration in the Senate and which was afterwards stricken out in conference?

Mr. HOLLIS. The amendment was as follows:

SEC. 26. That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

Section 6 of the Clayton Act provides merely that nothing in the Sherman Antitrust Act shall be construed to prohibit the ordinary functions of farmers' unions and labor unions. Section 20 provides that no injunction shall be issued by a Federal court to prevent a strike carried on in the usual way unless it is affirmatively shown that irreparable injury is likely to occur. It then provides that no injunction shall be issued to prevent peaceful picketing or persuasion or other ordinary legitimate methods of striking.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield further to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does not the Senator think that, if necessary, such an amendment can be enacted subsequently as substantive and independent legislation?

Mr. HOLLIS. I think it might, but I should dislike to undertake the contract of getting it through both Houses at this time. I think the situation may be so serious that the administration will have to take hold and insist on having it passed. If so, it will go through; otherwise I doubt if it could be put through.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I hesitate to interrupt the Senator further, but I feel that I ought to make one or two observations in view of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon. He has suggested that I appointed a subcommittee without deferring to his will. I acknowledge that I did appoint a subcommittee upon my own responsibility, because I had made a canvass of the Senate and had ascertained the objections entertained by the Senate to the bill. I desired to see if those objections could not be met and the bill placed upon the path to final passage in a much-improved form as compared with its character when it came from the House. I did appoint a subcommittee. I think every amendment but one recommended by the subcommittee to the whole committee was adopted by the whole committee, and afterwards the whole committee was forced to adopt that single exception. The Senate, as I remember, agreed to every amendment recommended by the whole committee which had previously been recommended to the whole committee by the subcommittee of my own appointment.

The Senator complains that I undertook to appoint the conference committee on behalf of the Senate. I did; and if I had been successful the word "recede" would not have been so conspicuous a legend upon the foreheads of certain Senators.

He complains that I undertook to appoint the conferees otherwise than in the order of their seniority upon the committee. That is true, Mr. President, but in that I violated no precedent. The conference committee on the food-survey bill was not selected in the order of seniority; and when that much-vaunted reform came over the Democratic side of the Senate some four or five years ago, the rule of seniority was abolished. There was no longer any rule or obligation requiring the appointment of conferees in the order of their precedence on a committee.

I was not so anxious to respect the ancient, iron-clad rule of seniority in selecting conferees as I was to have conferees who would in good faith stand by the action of the Senate, and who would not, as some of them did, back and fill and ultimately recede, as I had hazarded the prediction they would recede. I will not say that some of them were appointed to recede.

Mr. President, this is the extent of my offending in that regard. So far as it is the desire of the Senator from Oregon to "crawl like vermin in and out the crevices of the throne," that, sir, is a matter of taste. The Senator can consult his own feelings, and I shall not challenge his liberty to pursue that course. As a Senator of the United States and as a member of the conference committee I shall discharge my full duty as I see my duty. I shall accept the full responsibility; I shall accept the responsibility for my votes in the Senate, for my conduct in the conference. I shall not be driven from the path of duty either by the threats of power nor decoyed from that path by the smiles and the blandishments of power.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Oklahoma will discharge his duty as a Senator as he understands his duty and as his conscience permits and directs, but, while he is touching upon that subject, let me say that this is not the first administration bill he has opposed. He has the right to do it; nobody questions that right; it is his duty to do it when he feels that his conscience calls him to do it; but the Senator seems to forget that the United States is at war with one of the most powerful nations on the face of the earth. Not only has he obstructed this measure, but he has obstructed other measures. If the Senator claims any glory because of that course, Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that because of his opposition to some of the measures that have been enacted here and the doctrines he has preached I suspect that a number of young men out in his State have been killed in riots in opposition to the selective draft. Whether or not he was instrumental in bringing about that condition I do not know, but well do I know that the very men who are resisting the enforcement of the law that was enacted by Congress for raising an army derive encouragement from the preachments of the Senator in the Senate and in other parts of the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield further to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. GORE. The Senator takes occasion to say that this is not the first measure that I have obstructed in the Senate. The Senator is rather liberal in his definition of the word "obstruction." I have demonstrated, I think to the satisfaction of every Senator who has any sense of justice, that I have not obstructed either the food-survey bill or the food-dictatorship bill. I have speeded both to their passage, and have passed that responsibility to those who have sought dominion over the industries of this country. I have undertaken to make the present bill constitutional, to make it effective, to make it practicable, and to render it, in my judgment, less calculated to work inevitable mischief than to work some sort of benefit to this country. I challenge the Senator to state what other measure I have obstructed on its passage through the Senate. I say he will try in vain to name it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest the selective-draft bill, that was recommended——

Mr. GORE. I say that the Senator is again in error, and it shows his liberality not only in definition but, I had almost said, in the discussion of the fact.

Mr. President, for reasons which I need not mention I was not able to discuss the selective-draft measure upon its passage through this body. Under the five-minute rule I had the Secretary read at the desk a telegram to a newspaper in my State outlining my objections to that measure. The reading of that telegram required less than five minutes. Is that the offense for which the Senator arraigns me before the Senate and the country? Am I to be characterized as an obstructionist for opposing a measure revolutionizing the traditions of this country? I occupied less than five minutes. That five minutes was employed by the Secretary at the desk.

Mr. President, when the draft bill passed in 1863 during the Civil War there were 115 votes in the House for that measure. There were 49 votes against that measure in the House. There was much less division upon the passage of the recent measure, and as much as I opposed that measure—opposing it until the volunteer system had been given a trial—I disclaim as unfounded upon fact any imputation to the effect that I obstructed its passage.

Mr. President, there has been some resistance to the enforcement of the draft in the great young State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body. I issued an interview on yesterday, appearing in the morning papers, accounting, as I believe, for this resistance. It originated, as I am informed, among the Seminole Indians and the Seminole freedmen, being the negroes who were owned by the Seminoles when slavery prevailed in this country.

In the Indian appropriation bill passed last winter a provision was inserted providing for a payment of $200 per capita to these Indians and to their freedmen. The Comptroller of the Treasury ruled, however, that the payment could not be made on account of some ancient statute in relation to a school fund. The Indians felt that they had a grievance on account of the nonpayment of this money. They protested against fighting for a country—to use their own language—which would not vouchsafe to them their own rights. They had, as they believed, an accumulation of grievances; and I said in the interview, and I say now, that, at least so far as these people are concerned, they ought to be judged generously in this hapless protest against the law of the land.

Sir, I repeat, the Senate and the country must acquit me not only of obstruction but of any attempt to obstruct against the pending measure or against the selective-draft measure. But, sir, it is not necessary for me to disown that unfounded impeachment. The injustice of that charge, if not "known of all men," is at least known of all Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry who was neither on the subcommittee referred to that had this bill under consideration nor on the conference committee, that I ought to say just a word in relation to this controversy between the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. President, it was known, I presume generally, that the chairman of the committee was opposed to the bill. I think no one would want to take away from the chairman his right to oppose it. No one denies but that he was conscientious in his opposition; but when it is said that he undertook to obstruct it, it seems to me that some one who was not on either one of those committees and who knows what happened ought not to permit this occasion to go by without telling what he knows in regard to it.

When this bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and the chairman of the committee appointed a subcommittee to consider it, there might have been a discussion as to whether there ought to have been a subcommittee appointed or whether it ought to have been considered by the full committee. There is an opportunity for honest men to disagree as to which course ought to be taken. That a man can be patriotic and honest and anxious for expedition and take either course no man can deny.

When the chairman appointed that committee he put the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on the committee, and I was left off the committee. He put other Members on the committee that were of shorter service on the committee than myself. I never for a moment thought of charging the chairman of the committee with being unfair. He was exercising a discretion that was right. There was nothing wrong about it, as far as I know. When he selected the conferees, again, he selected the Senator from Oregon as one of the conferees. Again he went over my head and put some one on the conference committee who was junior in service to me; and again it seemed to me that there could be no charge made of anything wrong in regard to it. He exercised an honest and a fair discretion.

The chairman of the committee did this first act, the selecting of the committee, without any hesitancy. As I remember, it was done the same day that the bill was brought here. There never was a bill that came from the House to the Senate that was brought up for consideration by the committee quicker than this one. It would have been an impossibility to do it quicker. That subcommittee were in session all day, as I happen to know. The next day the full committee was called. There was more expedition than some members of the committee thought was proper for a full consideration of the important subject that was brought before it; and I think I am in a position to make this statement, because if, in the parliamentary practice that has gone on in the past, there is anything in the rule of seniority, I have a right to complain. I want here and now to testify that it seems to me the chairman of the committee has expedited this matter as much as any man could expedite it who was in favor of it. I think if anything, when he knew he was opposed to it and the President was for it, that, as the saying goes, he leaned backward in order not to have any delay.

I have never yet heard any member of the committee even indirectly intimate that the chairman in any way delayed anything. We were in session the next day all day, as I remember, and, as the chairman has said, the amendments suggested by this subcommittee, with one exception, I think—I think there was not more than that—were all agreed to. I did not favor all of them. I did not agree and I suppose I will not agree with the chairman of the committee when it comes to roll call on this conference report, but I do not want to see any injustice done to the chairman; and unwittingly, I think, my friend from Oregon has done the chairman an injustice.

We were in session all that day. That one amendment—by the way, an amendment that the chairman himself favored—was defeated in the committee. Afterwards, through the influence of the White House, another meeting of the committee was called, and the action of the committee was changed, and that amendment agreed to.

I believe, Mr. President, that this much ought to be said by one who knows what the facts are, and who has not taken any part in the matter, in defense of the chairman's position. I have not agreed with the chairman on this bill in a great many respects from the beginning; but I have never, in all the discussions that we have had, seen an intimation of any unpatriotic act or any intention, even indirectly, to delay action and consideration. On the other hand, he has always favored and always urged immediate action, I thought sometimes without sufficient time for full consideration.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is only one test with which I am familiar by which to determine whether strikes should be restrained and curbed, and that is to determine whether labor is getting more or less in return for its efforts than it has been getting in the past.

The majority of laboring men are pretty close to the fringe of existence all the time. A death in the family, or a serious illness, is enough to set back most families of laboring people for several months, if not for a year. Now, if it should appear that wages have increased as much in the last two years as the cost of living, and strikes were everywhere prevalent, then it might be said with some justice that strikes should be restricted and curbed. I have accordingly taken pains to inform myself as to the relative advance of wages and the cost of living. I intended to read several paragraphs from the testimony before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate on this particular bill, but I will read only a very short portion, because the point seems to be pretty generally recognized.

I read from the testimony of Dr. Clyde L. King, an assistant professor of political science in the University of Pennsylvania. There was a food riot in Philadelphia, and because of the food riot Dr. King made an investigation of the wage question and the high-cost-of-living question and the labor-union question in Philadelphia. I invite the attention of the Senate to Dr. King's testimony. I will read merely his conclusions. He said, on page 105:

> The conclusion is clearly this: That money wages have not increased certainly over 20 per cent; that foods have increased around 27 to 33 per cent. In other words, the actual wage has gone down; and it is very clear—I am giving these figures here in order to drive home the necessity for national action—it is certainly very clear that the actual wage can not continue to go down without very great suffering and without real direful consequences.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it would be of interest, in connection with what the Senator from New Hampshire has just been saying, to call to his attention the fact that the deposits in the Massachusetts savings banks last year were twice as great as they have ever been in the history of the State—that is, the increase in deposits over the previous year.

The deposits in the Massachusetts savings banks as nearly as possible represent the savings of labor. There are more than 2,500,000 depositors in a population of less than 4,000,000, and no man can have a deposit of more than $1,600 in the Massachusetts savings banks. It is not a place where men of wealth, or even of considerable means, leave their money, but it is the place where the average workingman does leave his savings.

For example, in the city of Lawrence, about which we heard a good deal two or three years ago—a city of probably less than 100,000 population, even under present conditions—there are three savings banks, and there are 30,000 deposits in one of them and practically as many in the other two; in other words, two-thirds as many deposits in savings banks in that city as there are people in the city.

I cite these facts simply to indicate that notwithstanding the high prices last year the workingman of Massachusetts was able to save twice as much as he has done in any previous year in the history of the State.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I have heard everything in the world proved by the savings-bank statistics of Massachusetts. There is no doubt that Massachusetts usually gets her share of what is going along, and I think Massachusetts has had her full share of the profits that have been made out of this war in the past two or three years. I am talking about the country generally. The Senator may quote savings-bank statistics from now to doomsday, but he can not wipe out testimony such as I have just read. My own investigation leads me to believe that the cost of what is called the table in the family of the average workingman has nearly doubled in the past three years, and I know that wages have not increased more than 20 or 30 per cent.

Mr. President, I have explained that I regret that I must vote against this conference report. It does not mean that the bill must be killed if the conference report is rejected. It is evident from what has taken place on the floor of the Senate to-day that the Senate believes that this amendment should be replaced in the bill. I hope those who really believe it, and who see the necessity for it, will vote with me to reject the report. There is no doubt that if the report goes back to the conference committee they will quickly restore this provision, and they may just as quickly report the bill back; and I am sure if it is reported back with that amendment restored the bill will promptly pass.

I say that because I want the Senator in charge of the bill to understand my great friendliness for him, my belief that he has acted throughout with the greatest consideration for me personally, and my hope that he will not consider it at all a personal criticism of him because I feel obliged, for good and sufficient reasons, to vote against the adoption of the report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire—for whom I entertain the very highest regard, both as to his ability and as to his sincerity—that I do not believe it will do any good to refer this bill back to the conferees. I am frank to say that I never heard anyone say that this amendment was stricken from the bill in conference in order that strikes might be prohibited, if need be, during the time of this war.

In order to get the matter before the Senate, let me call attention to the amendment which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] proposed on the floor of the Senate; and I think it was put into the bill by way of amendment, without much discussion, as I now recall. It is section 26 of the bill as it finally passed the Senate, and is as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

Mr. President, the sections of the act approved October 15, 1914, to which that exception was intended to apply, are as follows. I read this in order that the context may be in the RECORD.

Section 6 of the so-called Clayton Act provides:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws.

The bill under consideration does not in any way affect or repeal that provision of the law. Why refer to it, then?

The other section is section 20 of that act:

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto; nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States.

Those are the provisions of the Clayton bill, supplemental to the Sherman Antitrust Act, which the Senator by his amendment proposed to have excepted from the operation of the pending food bill. As I understand the Senator, the particular part of the bill which he says would prevent peaceful picketing by labor organizations or peaceful strikes is covered in section 4 of the food bill, which provides that it shall be unlawful—

To conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries.

Mr. President, there is not anything in this act, it seems to me, that would prevent labor organizations from peaceful picketing or the peaceful strike if they see fit to indulge in it; and while, as I said, I did not vote against the Senator's amendment, and I do not recall having been with the conferees when it was receded from, I would not have hesitated to do so in conference, because I think it unnecessary. It was insisted upon by the Senate conferees for quite a while and finally went out. I really do not know how many days it had been in conference before the Senate conferees finally receded. But, Mr. President, I have not any fear that in the administration of the food law anything would be attempted by the President or by the agencies which he has power to create under the act to prevent any labor or other organization from doing in a peaceful way all that they can now do under the Clayton law to protect themselves and their rights, without any saving clause in the bill under consideration. It is not necessary in this bill in order to protect those rights.

Mr. HARDWICK obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will permit me very briefly, the argument of the able Senator from Oregon does not meet the case at all. The provision of the food bill to which I have adverted makes it a distinct criminal offense for two of the officials of a labor union to arrange with each other to call a strike. If the officials of a labor union can not call a strike, a strike can not be effectively put into force. The provisions of the Clayton Act allow the ordinary procedures of labor unions to be carried out without the participants being held to violate the law. Therefore if the amendment stays out of this bill strikes will be effectively prohibited in the classes of industries that come under the purview of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I shall vote against the conference report, and I propose to give the Senate briefly three reasons why I shall do so.

Before I give those three reasons, however, I wish to say in just a word, having due regard to the rules of this body and the proprieties of this occasion, because during my temporary absence from the city a Member of the House of Representatives, in gross violation of the rules of that body and in gross violation of the proprieties and decencies of parliameneary intercourse, undertook to criticize and assail not only myself but other Members of this body whose conduct and whose views on different questions failed to meet his august approval.

I shall not dignify this gentleman—and I use the word in a strict parliamentary sense, as the rules of the Senate require it—by any particular attention at my hands. The statement that he made about me was positively untrue, namely, that I had held up the aviation bill 10 days. I offered an amendment and spoke nine minutes on it, and this distinguished gentleman at the other end of the Capitol said I had held up the aviation bill for 10 days! Well, of course, a man who speaks so loosely as that, and with so little regard both for the proprieties and for the truth, is not worthy of reply. I think it is better for things of that sort to be passed over. He violated the rules of the body to which he belongs, anyway.

Of course it is a matter of very deep regret to me, of very real regret, that my conduct as a Member of this body does not meet with the approval of that distinguished personage, but somehow or other I will try to get along without it. It will grieve me terribly to have to do it, but I will attempt to continue to discharge my duty in this body without very much concern for his opinion or for him. I care nothing for either.

There are three reasons why I am opposed to this conference report. There are three besides the first one I am going to mention, so there are really four. I want to be perfectly candid with the Senate. I am against this bill, and therefore I am against the conference report. The same reasons that impelled me to vote against this bill when it was put on its passage impel me to oppose the adoption of the conference report, because I think the bill is fundamentally and structurally wrong and can not be made right. I am very much more against the conference report, however, than I was against the bill that we passed in the Senate, because I believe this bill is an infinitely worse bill than the one that the Senate voted up a week or so ago, and I am going to give three reasons why I think so.

In the first place, I do not know how other Senators feel, but I am willing to bestow all the dictatorial power, all the one-man power, that can be enacted or that any Senator can desire when it comes to the prosecution of a military and naval campaign, when it comes to military operations against the foe, but I am utterly unwilling now, as I have always been, to assent to the one-man-power proposition in our ordinary civil and civic affairs. In Prussia, in Russia as it was under the Romanoffs, in some of the foreign countries where autocracies exist, it may be all right to have food dictators or food controllers or whatever else you want to call them, but as far as I am concerned I confess I am old-fashioned enough, democratic enough, American enough, not to like this one-man-power business. I infinitely prefer a board of three. There is more balance to it; there is more chance to avoid mistakes; there is more chance that the board so constituted will not be guilty of arbitrary, despotic, and unfair conduct. You at least are addressing yourself to the intelligence and integrity of three men rather than one.

The Senate thought so by an overwhelming vote—almost two to one. My recollection is—I have not the figures before me—that the vote was about 50 to 33.

Mr. GRONNA. There were very few votes against the board; I think not to exceed 12 votes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is wrong. My recollection is that the amendment was sustained by two or three to one.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The first vote to which the Senator refers was 66 to 10. I recall it because I was one of the 10.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then the verdict was more overwhelming than I thought. I thought the final vote that was the real test on the question was about 54 to 32, or something like that. Anyhow, the RECORD will show. But the fact remains the Senate voted for the amendment by an overwhelming majority. I think about two to one. The Senator from California thinks on an equally significant vote it was almost six to one in favor of this proposition of a board of three instead of one to constitute this board or this dictatorship or this controllership, whatever you may wish to call it.

Now, what reason have we to change our minds in so short a time? What has happened to cause us to change it? What change has come over the spirit of our dream? Can any Senator avow it? Can any Senator give us the reasons now why the Senate ought to so completely reverse itself in so short a time on so well considered a proposition? If there is a reason, it does not appeal to me. It is not founded in logic. It is not founded, in my judgment, on any change of conviction on the part of any Senator. I think the Senate ought to maintain its position. I do not think it ought to agree to this conference report, because the conferees deliberately surrendered the position of the Senate on this matter, taken after a long struggle over this question and after a full understanding of it. When conferees do that, and do it in my judgment unnecessarily, then I do not think we ought to accept their work when they submit it to be approved by the body of which they are the agents.

Second, I am opposed to the adoption of this conference report because the conferees have stricken from the bill the provision for a committee to supervise war expenditures. That was another proposal adopted by the Senate by an almost two-to-one vote.

Mr. President, if that committee had been proposed in the same language that a similar committee was constituted during the Civil War and if its jurisdiction had extended beyond guarding and examining and looking into the expenditure of the money that we appropriate, and might have trenched upon the conduct of the war generally, as far as military and naval operations go, the selections of generals and admirals and other things that ought to belong exclusively to the executive department, then I could understand how Senators or people outside of this body, and even outside of Congress, might have opposed it. Frankly I could not have supported such a proposal myself. I do think, opposed as I am to conferring despotic power on the Executive, that when it comes to military matters the Executive ought to have full power, and I am ready to vote to give it at any time; but how on earth anybody could object to Congress appointing a joint committee to go over the expenditures, to see as far as we can how the money that we appropriate is spent, and to see that it shall be spent in no other way except as the law provides, and economically spent—I say, how anyone anywhere could oppose any such proposition is beyond my comprehension.

It seems to me that any President of the United States would be more than glad to share responsibility of this kind with a joint committee of Congress. It seems to me that any executive of any country on this earth, carrying the awful load of responsibility in respect to matters of this kind that the executive must carry and carrying it as he must with the aid of hundreds and thousands of men whom he must appoint to help exercise the executive authority, would be glad to have Congress look into these expenditures and do all it can to keep everything right and straight.

So I can not understand the opposition to the appointment of a joint congressional committee, whose functions shall be limited entirely and solely to the expenditures of the money that Congress has appropriated. I can not see why the conferees should have found it necessary to again abandon the position that the Senate had taken by an overwhelming vote.

Now, there is a third reason why I think the conference report ought to be rejected. It grows out of the licensing section—section 5, I believe. It is found on page 8 of the conference print.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up any considerable part of the Senate's time, so I am not going to read all this language to the Senate. Senators who are interested in the subject have the provisions of the section as reported by the conferees before them or they can readily obtain access to the printed copy that contains it.

When the bill was before the Senate originally a great many of us thought that the licensing section was the most dangerous as well as the most unnecessary of all the powers conferred. So in response to that sentiment developed on this floor the Senate committee first, and the Senate itself finally, very much limited the licensing section, specifying a few, and only a few, articles and commodities to which it should be applied. It went to conference in that shape. But it comes out of the conference in a form and shape that is, if anything, more objectionable than the original language of the House bill. It confers broader powers, more despotic powers, more autocratic powers over American business than the original proposal did, if such a thing as that is possible. After all, I think I shall read it:

SEC. 5. That from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. In the interest of accuracy, if the Senator will permit me, I have here the official vote of the Senate upon the question whether there should be one administrator or a board of three.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would be glad if the Senator would give the figures.

Mr. GRONNA. On the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH]——

Mr. HARDWICK. For one.

Mr. GRONNA. For one—in the Committee of the Whole, the vote was as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has stated, yeas 10, nays 63. When the bill was reported to the Senate another amendment for one was offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], and that amendment was rejected by a vote of 60 to 23.

Mr. HARDWICK. The final vote was 60 to 23—over 2 to 1. I thank the Senator for putting the figures into the RECORD in the interest of accuracy.

Now, Mr. President, going on just one moment with the licensing section, a more despotic, autocratic, and unnecessary power over the great businesses and industries of the people of a free country was never conferred in the history of all time, in my judgment, on anybody—king, emperor, kaiser, president, or what not—than is suggested in this bill. It is unnecessary; utterly so. What Senator has stood before the Senate or the country giving any reason for this broad licensing power? Are we to be told that in a free country we are to surrender all the business of the country to the control of the Executive authority, to be carried on according to the will of one man, and that we ought to do it without the slightest showing being made on earth that there is any necessity for it or that it has any real or direct connection with the prosecution of the war?

Ah, Senators, I can see how if an invading army was sweeping this country, I can see how if it was necessary from the standpoint of the preservation of the Nation's life, I can see how if the Senate thought it was necessary in order to perpetuate the Government itself, almost any power might be granted. The Constitution itself is broad enough to permit it, and the war powers are vast enough and deep enough and strong enough to permit it.

In order to accomplish it we do not have to do like some Senator has suggested—suspend the Constitution—because the Constitution itself contains all the elements of any needed and necessary power for the prosecution of this or any other war. But it does seem to me that before we undertake to delegate this vast authority over American business of every kind and character everywhere, from a blacksmith shop to a department store, it would be just as well for us at least to believe ourselves that it has some real and direct connection with the war, and there is some real necessity in the interest of the country, its Government, and its people to do it.

For one, before I can vote for any such proposition as that, which is a complete reversal of all the principles of the American people—which is Prussianism, in my judgment, instead of Americanism—it will have to be shown to me pretty plainly, pretty clearly, pretty distinctly, and pretty convincingly, that the interests of the Nation are really involved, that the life of the country itself is at stake, and that this is really a part of the necessary defense of the country itself. No such showing as that has been made, or even attempted, and in its absence it is incomprehensible to me how any Senator of the United States can think of voting such vast, arbitrary, and unnecessary powers.

For all those reasons, Mr. President, I believe the conference report ought to be rejected, and I shall so vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield, although I had concluded what I rose to say.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. The Senator is opposed to the adoption of this report for three reasons, one of which he states to be the elimination of the proposed joint committee to supervise war expenditures. I understood the Senator to say that he would be opposed to a joint committee which undertook in any wise to participate in the problems directly connected with the conduct of the war.

Mr. HARDWICK. Or the war itself.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator what he thinks such a committee as is proposed by the Senate amendment would do?

Mr. HARDWICK. Would the Senator like to have an answer now?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. My idea is that such a committee would go over all the expenditures we have made to see how they are spent. The committee would investigate whether the purposes designated in the bill were within the compass of the law and whether the money had been honestly spent for the purpose authorized by law or not. In other words, the committee would do all in its power to secure an honest, economical use of the money for the purpose for which it had been appropriated.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand the Senator to concede that the committee would act as a sort of legislative auditing committee?

Mr. HARDWICK. Somewhat so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator think it necessary for Congress to appoint Senators and Representatives to act as auditors?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it is very necessary sometimes. I have seen a great many instances in my 20 years' service where it did a great deal of good.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me put a hypothetical case to the Senator. Suppose the committee that is proposed should begin to investigate as to how the $640,000,000 appropriated for the Aviation Corps was being expended, and should discover that a certain type of flying machine was being bought by the department, and suppose this committee of Senators and Representatives thought it ought to be another type of machine bought, does not the Senator think that that committee could address itself to the consideration of that subject strictly under the authority conveyed by the amendment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think not. I do not think they would have any such power. The amendment was not framed for any such purpose as that. It is not designed for any such purpose as that, and it could not be done, under its language.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The language is:

> It shall be the duty of said committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive department, and it shall be the duty of the executive departments, on request, to keep said committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.

I call the Senator's attention to this fact, that the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the Civil War had no power on earth except to investigate.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is greatly mistaken.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What power had it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have not the language now. If the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] were here he would give it. They had a great deal of power to consult and investigate.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator let me answer that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The chief power of that committee during the Civil War was to assist and make post-mortem findings upon defunct generals.

Mr. HARDWICK. Upon defunct generals and lost campaigns. That was their principal purpose.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It was an investigating power.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; it was a committee appointed on the conduct of the war. That is its specific language. It was a committee "on the conduct of the war."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. In conversation with members of the conference I think there will be no secret in saying that those who favored the amendment were perfectly willing, if the language gave any power as to the conduct of the war, to recede as far as that was concerned and confine it exclusively to the duty of looking into the financial expenditures.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly, and that was exactly what this proposition meant. It was purposely changed before we voted on it from the language employed in the creation of the Civil War Committee. Some of us who supported this proposal realized the difficulties and dangers and disadvantages of adopting a proposal of that sort, but in this proposal, the one offered finally by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], it was expressly, by its language, limited to an examination into expenditures, and possibly the word "contracts" was put in also—expenditures and contracts. It did not have the very general language relating to the conduct of the war which authorized the Civil War Committee, as pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], to sit as a sort of post-mortem board on defunct generals and lost campaigns.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me further——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Committee on the Conduct of the War in the Civil War did not confine itself to matters in the nature of post mortems. It undertook to interfere with the organization of the Army. One thing I distinctly remember was not in the nature of a post-mortem investigation, but the committee of Senators and Representatives set themselves up as military authorities as to how to organize an army.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator need not worry himself about the language creating that committee. We are not so much concerned with that as we are with the pending proposal. The words "the conduct of the war" were not included in the language of the pending proposal. It was not proposed to give this committee any power on earth, except the power to look into expenditures and contracts.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes, Mr. President; but, if I may submit a further observation, it seems to me to be plain common sense that if a committee is to investigate expenditures which have been made by the departments of the Government the pursuit of that power will lead its nose into every activity of the Government, and it can pursue its investigations just as far as the money is spent. That seems to me to be plain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is a committee to smell the Executive.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is what it is—a committee to snoop around. It is what we might call a collection of Paul Prys to run around and see if the United States Government, through its executive branch, is spending the money in a way which meets with the approval and judgment of that committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am taking the Senator's time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Go on.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I care not what the language of the resolution is. The fact of the matter is that if the committee can investigate expenditures it can investigate the purposes for which the expenditures are made and can report to Congress its views upon the wisdom of those expenditures for those particular purposes and can air before the country all of the activities of the Executive in the conduct of the war. That is what it seems to me the particular committee provided for in this amendment, which the conferees have left out, in substance was authorized to do. I care not for the form of it, but it seems to me that the language written into the bill by the Senate, being the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], was nothing more nor less in substance than the creation of a committee similar to the committee on the conduct of the war during the Civil War.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I had not intended to say another word about the matter, but, of course, the views stated by the Senator make it necessary that I should submit one or two additional observations. It seems to me as though it were a matter of plain common sense that the Congress of the United States has a right to inquire how $17,000,000,000 which it shall have appropriated is being spent. It seems to me that it has come to a pretty pass if the Congress of the United States can not propose to do that without being arraigned as trying to snoop around at the Executive or, to use the coarser term, to smell around him.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think if the Government is paying $35 a thousand for lumber with which to construct cantonments, while private individuals can buy it at $22.50 a thousand, that is a legitimate subject of inquiry? If the Government is paying $40 apiece for rifles, while it used to pay only $17.90, is that not a legitimate subject of inquiry? If the Government is buying lumber in Texas for a military post in Atlanta, Ga., instead of buying it in Georgia, is not that a legitimate subject of inquiry?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma might specify, I presume, to even a greater extent than he has done. His specification is but an illustration, and a very brilliant one, too, of the necessity for this committee. What amazes me beyond comprehension is how any executive can object to it. Prying around! They had better want somebody to pry around before the lid blows off. Snoop about! Every friend of the President of the United States in this Chamber, and in this land, had better pray that he may have all the assistance that it is possible for him to have from every honorable source to keep these expenditures down to an honest and legitimate basis, to keep down grafting and stealing. I say that we have fallen upon evil days, and the Congress of the United States has sunk to a low estate if we can not claim the right to see how the money which we appropriate is being spent, and whether or not it is being honestly spent, without being charged with being Paul Prys and snoopers.

The Senator from Delaware insists, in spite of the fact that his attention has been specifically directed to the difference in language, that this is the same proposal that gave so much trouble in the Civil War. With all due respect to the distinguished Senator from Delaware, he has nothing on earth to do but to read the language of the two proposals and to put them in parallel columns, and there is not a schoolboy 16 years of age in his State or in mine who will not see the difference. In one case specific authority to inquire and to advise about the conduct of military operations was conferred upon the committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think I have somewhere here the resolution creating the joint committee on the conduct of the war in 1861.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Secretary will send me the original Weeks's proposition I can show the Senator the scope of the resolution which created the committee on the conduct of the war.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like the Senator to point out—I find I have it not here—where in that resolution is there specific authority to look into the conduct of military and naval operations of the United States?

Mr. HARDWICK. If I can get the proposal originally submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts I will show it to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts right here.

Mr. HARDWICK. The original proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] is in the very language in which the resolution was enacted during the Civil War. It reads:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint committee shall be appointed composed of six Members of the Senate—to be known as the "Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War."

And so on—

That was the same language which was used in 1861 or 1863, whenever it was that resolution was passed.

The membership of such committee shall be designated by the respective committees which select the members of the regular standing committees. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress, shall make a special study of the problems arising out of the war, shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, and shall make report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Now, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator from Georgia made the statement that the committee constituted during the Civil War was specifically authorized to inquire into military and naval operations. Where is that specific authority found in the resolution which the Senator from Georgia has just read?

Mr. HARDWICK. The language is:

To be known as the "Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the resolution also provides that the committee—shall make a special study of the problems arising out of the war.

That is as broad as language can make it—not only the problems of expenditure or of contracts, but problems of all sorts, military, naval, and everything else. If the Senator from Delaware will read the history of that period—of course, I suppose he has done so; I do not mean that suggestion in an unfriendly way or in an uncomplimentary way—he will find that they did assume such authority under that resolution, and that their authority to assume it was not questioned by the Chief Executive, who repeatedly and continually conferred with them about first appointing one general or deposing another and about how this, that, or the other should be done in the way of military or naval operations. Undoubtedly, if the Senator pleases, that is the history of the Civil War committee. It not only had, in my opinion, from the language of the resolution, the authority to be consulted fully about all the problems of the war of all sorts, military as well as financial, that grew out of the Civil War, but it actually assumed and exercised such authority. Of course, the Senator from Delaware must see and must concede that the proposal which was recently submitted to the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] expressly and purposely cut out all that and specifically and particularly confined the operations of this committee to expenditures and to contracts made under congressional appropriations.

I can not see, with all deference to my friend, that there is anything at all similar in the two proposals; I can not see, with all deference to any Senator who is inclined to take the other view, how any Senator of the United States, how any member of the Cabinet, how anybody who belongs to any branch of the Government can object to Congress undertaking to find out how and why the money of the people is being expended.

To tell you the honest truth about it, if we were inclined to take a selfish view, if we were inclined to shirk the duties and responsibilities that belong to us, it would probably be wiser for us to have nothing to do with it and to let the responsibility rest entirely and solely upon the Executive of this country; but, in spite of what the Executive himself may think, in spite of what other people may believe, my own belief is that the Senate and House of Representatives ought to shoulder and share the responsibilities of this character whenever they think proper to do so, whether they are requested to do it or not, or even if it is desired that they should not do so. In other words, I think we owe a duty and a responsibility to the people of the United States, whose money we alone can appropriate, that we can neither shirk nor evade, in this matter.

I can really see no legitimate reason, according to my way of looking at the matter, why anyone should oppose it. It seems to me that any President of the United States would be glad enough to have all the checks and balances and restraints thrown about this business that it is possible to have, when we are spending these tremendously vast and unprecedentedly enormous sums of money, because, at best, no matter what anybody may do and no matter what everybody can do, something of course is going to go wrong when so much money as that is being spent. We ought to minimize that possibility as much as we can; we ought to put as many restraints on the people who are spending this money as possible; we ought to have as many people to whom they are responsible and by whom they can be held accountable and to whom they must account as is possible. The deterrent effect alone is worth a great deal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator object to having read in the RECORD at this point the views of Mr. Lincoln with reference to the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War during the Civil War?

Mr. HARDWICK. I would rather the Senator would do it in his own time, because, as I have just pointed out to the Senate, that has no more relation to this problem than the North Pole to the South Pole—none in the world—and the Senator can not find anything in Lincoln's works or in any expression from Lincoln anywhere that will amount to anything when it is remembered that the committee sought to be created at this time is not a committee on the conduct of the war and has nothing to do with the appointment or demotion of generals and admirals or the military or naval operations, but is solely confined to expenditures and to contracts made under appropriations granted by Congress.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. WOLCOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield, and, if so, to whom; or, has he released the floor?

Mr. HARDWICK. Unless the Senator from Delaware desires to interrupt me, I will yield the floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to get the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, as throwing some light on the subject that is now under discussion, I ask that the Secretary be permitted to read an editorial from the New York World entitled "In the Light of History," which discusses the activities of the Committee on the Conduct of the War during the Civil War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to have the editorial named by him read. Is there objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, would the Senator object to having that read as soon as I get through, instead of having it read now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Oregon yields to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, what the people of the United States and what the country now would rather see than the appointment of this joint smelling committee would be, if such a thing could be organized, a committee on the conduct of Congress. I do not know how other Senators feel, but I am rapidly reaching the stage where I am, during this war at any rate, neither a Democrat nor a Republican, and I believe the country is rapidly reaching the stage where they think Congress ought to confess that it is divided into two parties, one in favor of supporting the hands of the United States, holding them up while this war is going on, and the other in favor of resorting to every technicality and parliamentary rule possible for the purpose of criticizing, injecting suspicion, arousing distrust, and giving, not confidence and hand-upholding, but the very opposite of it to the administration, the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize a fact which every 16-year-old schoolboy, to use the language of the Senator this evening, knows. This Congress already has power to investigate the expenditure of every item of appropriation made by it. I do not remember how many standing committees on expenditures there are in this august body, but we have a Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, a Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, a Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, and several other standing committees on expenditures in every department of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. Including a Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and in the Navy Department, the two together taking in the whole war, of course, and if there is anything else remotely related to it the other expenditures committees take that in.

Senators argue as though, if we did not establish this smelling committee, we would have no authority to find out what had become of the money which we had appropriated, when, if they know anything about the rules of the Senate at all, they know better. They furthermore know that any morning on any day any Senator can come in here and move the appointment of a special committee to investigate a special matter, and that any Member of the House may do the same thing.

Either this proposed committee is intended for something broader and more remote and more ulterior and less confessed than appears upon its face, or else it is unnecessary. If it is merely a committee for the investigation of expenditures under appropriations of Congress, it is absolutely unnecessary, and if it have any ulterior purpose, what is that purpose? I said if it have. I put it in the subjunctive because I do not want to be unfair. If it have any ulterior purpose, what is that ulterior purpose? Ah, it is to display as existent, in this body, suspicion and lack of trust in the Executive, whose duty it is to carry on the war, as it was the duty of Congress to declare it.

There may be beyond that, for all I know, the purpose of creating distrust or suspicion if they do not already exist.

I do not know how the President of the United States feels about this matter. I know how Lincoln felt about a similar committee in his time. Under apparently innocent language providing for investigating the problems of the war that committee, made up of old Ben Wade and a number of others, undertook to direct the military and naval operations of the United States. Mr. Lincoln, a long-suffering, patient man; a man with the utmost intellectual humility, felt hurt to the core, although he did not veto the legislation constituting that committee. I repeat that I do not know how the present President feels, but I know how I would feel if I were President and you passed such a measure. I would veto it quicker than I can snap three fingers, and I would tell you that the American people had elected me Chief Magistrate and Executive of this country, and I was responsible to them in my executive functions, except in so far as you have the right to investigate, and, if necessary, to impeach; that I regarded it as a vote of lack of confidence, which you had no right to pass and which I would disregard by the power of veto; that, in so far as it was necessary to keep this country honest in its expenditures while the war was going on, by God's grace I would attempt to do it to the best of my ability, and whenever I found that I was helpless I would call upon you and upon the American people for help; but I did not think it was right beforehand, under the guise of doing that which you have a right to do any morning in the day, through your standing committees or through your special committees, to send out word to the American people that I had to be watched, smelled; that Congressmen and Senators had to sit around and judge of this contract or the other.

What would occur if you had such a committee? I will tell you one thing that would occur—what occurred during the Civil War, when many a so-called Christian statesman's name went down to eternal infamy. Why? Because every fellow that wanted to sell lumber or tents or uniforms or shoes to the Federal Government was constantly engaged in interviewing some member of the joint committee. "Here is a man that they have bought shoes from, or bought lumber from, and I bid something less," or "If I had furnished them there would have been a less freight rate," and that gave the Christian statesman a chance to operate, and the Christian statesman operated.

Thank God, that day has passed. That sort of thing would not happen now to the same extent, but this would happen: That committee would be dogged to death, as Congressmen and Senators are now dogged to death, by men who want to be introduced to one department or another in order that they may get a chance to make Army contracts. I had occasion not long ago to tell a young Member of the Senate, as the result of my experience of nearly a quarter of a century in public life, if he wanted to be sure of one thing in this world, never even to listen to a man that told him he wanted him to introduce him to somebody to get a contract.

Now I go back to the first point. Either this committee is not intended to do simply and solely and only what the language says, or else this committee is an unnecessary committee.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator think that this committee, under the language, has any power to conduct its investigations in such broad range as I indicated a moment ago?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, absolutely. If a committee is a committee upon investigation of the expenditure of appropriations, it may not only find whether an appropriation for Army uniforms was spent for uniforms or for shoes or for socks, but it may also go further and investigate whether or not the man who made the lowest bid or who had the lowest freight rate got the contract. It may go from that into every phase of the situation. It may also investigate whether the contract was given to the man who, even though he did not make the lowest bid, made the best bid, because he had the best article. The minute it goes into the subject at all, it sets itself up as a supreme court upon quantity and quality and price of articles bought. There can be no escape from it.

If any man have any doubt about what I have said, let him analyze the vote when it is finally cast. I say that if this be a committee for the purposes which the language says it is for, then it is unnecessary; and if it be something else than that, then its purpose is an attack, more or less concealed, upon the Executive. If any man have a doubt about that, let him analyze the final vote.

Mr. President, I now ask, in connection with this question, that the Secretary read at the desk an editorial from the New York World of two or three days ago, which has just been handed me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the reading of an editorial. Is there objection? There being none, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE LIGHT OF HISTORY.

Lincoln opposed the creation of the committee on the conduct of the war as "an unfriendly measure." He not only "expressed doubts as to the wisdom of the movement but also fears that the committee might, by unfriendly action, greatly embarrass the Executive."

He was compelled to accept it, however, because of the assurances given by Wade and Chandler that the committee purposed to cooperate with the Executive. Lincoln could not carry on the war without the support of the radical Republicans in Congress, and therefore had to get along with them as best he could.

Chandler's biographer boasted that "the committee soon became a second Cabinet council." "Its sessions were nearly perpetual." "Many of its transactions were never committed to paper, and, as its members were sworn to strict secrecy, will never be revealed."

Gideon Welles, Lincoln's Secretary of the Navy, described this committee as "a convenient machine to cover up what the War Department wishes to cover up, and it can be directed against those that the War Department would assail." Its attitude toward Lincoln may be judged from its report on Frémont's administration of the Western Department. Lincoln had properly revoked Frémont's premature and unauthorized emancipation order, but the committee unhesitatingly took sides with Frémont against the President. It praised Frémont's notorious bungling and incompetence as "eminently characterized by earnestness, ability, and most unquestionable loyalty."

The committee joyously whitewashed Butler for the Fort Fisher fiasco, in spite of Grant's deliberate judgment that it was "a gross and culpable failure." It is related by Sherman in his memoirs that while Butler was explaining to the satisfaction of the committee that Fort Fisher could not be taken by assault, a newsboy was heard shouting, "Extras." Calling him in, the committee found that Fort Fisher had already been taken.

The kind of military judgment that it brought to the conduct of the war may be inferred from a remark of Wade, its chairman, in 1862, when he said of the Army of the Potomac:

"These 160,000 men could whip the whole Confederacy if they were given a chance. If I was their commander, I would lead them across the Potomac, and they would not come back until they had won a victory and the war was ended or they came back in their coffins."

Nine months after Gettysburg the committee was still nagging Lincoln to remove Meade and reinstate Hooker.

Apologists for the committee have had much to say about the invaluable military advice that it rendered to the Government. It is significant in this connection that none of the Union generals in his memoirs referred to any military suggestion that ever came from the committee. Grant did not recognize its existence and never mentioned it as an agency of Government. Sherman had nothing to say about it except the ridiculous episode of Butler's testimony.

Abraham Lincoln was more competent to conduct the Civil War than all the committees of a dozen Congresses. If Congress had supported him honestly and refrained from playing politics with the war the conflict might have been shortened by at least two years. Many of the military blunders of the Civil War, and practically all of the gross corruption and venality, can be traced directly to congressional meddling with the business of the Executive.

Every lawful and necessary function which Congress has to perform in connection with the conduct of war can be done through the regular committees which have power to supervise and audit expenditures, summon witnesses, take testimony, investigate all matters that require investigation, and make whatever recommendations to the House and Senate that the situation demands. The proposal for a special committee on the conduct of the war is a proposal to enable a small group of politicians to embarrass and harass the President, nag generals and admirals, meddle with the work of administrative officers, and otherwise cripple the efficiency of the Government in war.

Instead of originating in the United States Senate the scheme should more properly have originated with the Kaiser or the German general staff.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just an observation in three or four sentences about the article that has just been read.

I am surprised that an article of this sort should be sent to the desk by so distinguished a Senator as either the Senator from Oregon or the Senator from Mississippi. It will be noted, in listening to that article as it was read, that the reflections it casts upon the so-called joint committee on the couduct of the war which was established by Congress during the Civil War are directed entirely to its meddling in military affairs. That committee is condemned and indicted by the New York World in the article just read upon those grounds, and those grounds alone. The article contributes nothing whatsoever to the present discussion, for there is no proposal pending before the Senate which will authorize any committee of the Congress, joint or otherwise, to meddle in the military operations of the Government.

Mr. President, let me say, whether this is to be made a part of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi or not, that it is not worth the paper it is printed upon as a contribution to this discussion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] takes the position that the committee provided for in the so-called food-control bill is an entirely different thing from the committee provided for during the Civil War. It is very true that there is a distinction in the language employed. It will be observed that the resolution creating the Civil War committee contained no specific grant of power. The authorization to the committee to undertake to do the things which it subsequently did is entirely inferred from very general language.

The Civil War resolution created a joint committee on the conduct of the war. The employment of that phrase, "conduct of the war," I have no doubt was laid hold of as a justification for the thought that this committee could investigate the conduct of the war in all its details so far as the committee saw fit to go. The authority to that committee proceeded in other general language in this fashion:

Such committee shall make a special study of the problems arising out of the war.

It is to be again noted that there is no specific grant of authority to that special committee. It is very general language; and yet the fact of the matter is that this committee, under the very broad and very innocent-appearing language used, undertook to conduct examinations that filled something like four or five volumes of testimony. It sat from 1861 to the end of the war in 1865. It examined 200 witnesses; and, under this very indefinite grant of power which I have cited here, of those 200 witnesses it called before it out of the field 100 generals. So it states in its report to Congress.

That committee was not appointed for the purpose of gathering anything in the way of constructive information for the use of Congress. It was solely and entirely a committee that nosed around in the conduct of the war, gathering information, without attempting to make a single, solitary recommendation to the Congress that appointed it. The language of the committee itself is explicit upon this point. The committee says as follows in its report to the Thirty-seventh Congress, third session:

Your committee could perceive no necessity for recommending any particular legislation to Congress.

It was solely and entirely an investigating body, and every particle of its power came from the fact that it got hold of information and could frighten the Executive arm of the Government into listening to its suggestions, and I think the facts justify me in saying, in listening to its commands. That committee had the power of publicity, and it was through that power of publicity that it was enabled to exercise the extreme authority it did, to do the damage it did, to work the gross outrage and injustice that at times it did.

It is said that the committee provided for in section 23 of the food bill is not intended to exercise any such power. I say, Mr. President, I do not care what is intended by the mover of the resolution or by the Senate adopting it. I say that any man, any schoolboy—with all due deference to the Senator from Georgia—if he has the slightest remnant of common sense about him, knows that any committee that has power to investigate expenditures made in the conduct of the war—for that is the language of it—has power to pursue those expenditures to their remotest connection, to summon witnesses before that committee to enable it to investigate those expenditures, to find out what has been done with the money, even so far as planning campaigns is concerned and sending a navy abroad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, if the Senator will pardon me, to determine whether the amount paid to a certain admiral or general is wisely expended.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Exactly so. I was about to follow it in that way. If it can pass upon the expenditure of the money given to conduct this war it can undertake to pass upon the question of whether or not a general in charge of the forces in France is fit to command the army which this money is being spent to maintain there. I say that is the logical deduction to which we are led when we consider the broad power conferred by this amendment upon this committee.

As I pointed out, the Civil War committee exercised its powers by deducing them from such general language as that. Therefore I say, Mr. President, that in the very essence of the thing there is no escape from the proposition that though the language of the amendment creating this committee is different from the language of the resolution creating the Civil War committee, yet in substance and in fact they amount to one and the same proposition.

If you take the legislative history of this amendment, I think we are justified in saying that there is considerable force in the thought that from that legislative history itself the amendment is intended to do the very thing which a joint committee on the conduct of the war could undertake to do.

Some time ago, April 9, the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] introduced Senate joint resolution No. 25 in the Senate providing for the creation of a joint committee on the conduct of the war, modeling his resolution on the exact language of the Civil War committee. It went to the Committee on Rules and there stayed for a long time. When the food bill got before the Senate and approached its final passage the junior Senator from Massachusetts introduced in substance with some variations of phaseology his amendment doing what? Creating a joint committee on the conduct of the war. The junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] offered a substitute to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] which was agreeable to the junior Senator from Massachusetts. With his astuteness he saw that he was securing by the substitute offered by the junior Senator from Oklahoma the idea which was originally embodied in Senate joint resolution No. 25. Whether the junior Senator from Massachusetts so reasoned it out I do not know, but I am convinced in my own mind that the power conferred upon the proposed committee by the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is as ample and as broad and as potential as was the power conferred upon the joint committee on the conduct of the war in the sixties.

When this matter of the appointment of a joint committee on the conduct of the war was first mentioned to me, which was, I think, some two or three months ago, I confess that it appealed to me as a very reasonable and as a very sensible proposition, because I saw Congress releasing vast grants of power, and, it seemed to me, if Congress was releasing vast grants of power, it was wise to follow that power up, so to speak, with an agency on the part of Congress to see how that power was exercised. The idea somewhat appealed to me, and I think if I had been called upon to vote immediately on this proposition at that time I would have voted for a joint committee.

But, Mr. President, I would have done it in ignorance, and I would have regretted it when I learned the deplorable experience of the administration in the Civil War. I would have regretted to the end of my days that I, in this great emergency, had helped to shackle the administration with such a pestiferous body and—I speak in all deference—undertaken to interfere with things that belong primarily to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It is not the business of Congress to run this war. It is not the business of Congress to shape the campaign. It is not the business of Congress to direct a fleet. It is the business of the Commander in Chief to do so, and Congress has no right to expect to do it. If fraud is committed, of course it should be uncovered. If there is any reason to show that fraud was committed at any time during the progress of the war, Congress will undoubtedly set to work and investigate it, uncover it, and hold up to public ignominy the scoundrel who practiced it. But Congress ought not in the very beginning to assume that the executive department is infested with thieves and crooks and incompetents and set to work a joint committee to watch them and seek to guard against and guide them.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator is right about that, we ought not to have committees on the expenditures of the various executive departments, to which the Senator from Mississippi referred.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am speaking of this great task, that needs centralized authority; that must act quickly, and ought not to be restricted by a committee that is threatening all the time, or which may threaten all the time, to hold up some innocent and proper act to prejudice before the country and expose it to unjust and harsh criticism and thus palsy, perhaps, the strong arm of the Government.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator then would favor the abolition of the standing committees on the expenditures of the several executive departments in both Houses of Congress, I reckon.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator reckons wrong on that. I would not.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the difference between a standing committee and this committee?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am making a distinction between them in an emergency. I do not think myself that the general committees on expenditures in the various departments can go as far as this committee can go. This committee is set up for the specific purpose of investigating expenditures in connection with the conduct of the war, and that goes the whole limit. That is my conception.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one more question. The Senator said something about military campaigns being directed by it. Where did the Senator get that idea?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I say I think the committee could do it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Under the language proposed?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not ask the Senator any more than that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator was not in here when I touched on that point.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am sorry I missed it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not care to duplicate my remarks.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator just tell me why?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will tell the Senator. It is because I think the power to supervise expenditures justifies a committee of Congress to go just as far as those expenditures reach, and I say this is conceivable—that that committee, in supervising——

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not want the Senator to get away from the point in my mind. Let us test that matter. Because this committee has authority to determine whether Army blankets were bought at a proper figure or not, does the Senator contend that it has authority to say whether a campaign was wisely fought or not?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, no. The Senator does not credit me with the sense of a schoolboy, to which he referred a while ago.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I have a very high opinion of the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In all kindness I say the Senator does not have a very high opinion of my intelligence when he asks me if I think that because the committee may supervise the purchase of blankets they can therefore supervise the conduct of a campaign.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what the Senator is contending.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I do not contend for any such thing. I was endeavoring to elaborate my idea when the Senator interrupted me.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. I shall be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Here is my point. It is conceivable that if the committee has full authority to investigate expenditures made in the conduct of the war that committee may investigate the expenditures of funds spent upon the maintenance of the Army in Europe, and it may in its august wisdom conclude that it is a foolish expenditure of money to keep an army in Europe under the command of Gen. So-and-so, and air the whole thing to the public. That, I submit, Mr. President, is sensible talk, and that in substance is what the committee on the conduct of the Civil War did do under a resolution which granted it the general authority to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. POMERENE. It would have authority to investigate the wisdom or unwisdom of building a battle fleet.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Exactly so. As suggested to me by the senior Senator from Ohio, it would have authority to investigate the wisdom or unwisdom of building a battle fleet. It might undertake to investigate the wisdom or unwisdom of building so many submarines or keeping them on this side or on the other side.

Mr. HARDWICK. Allow me to point out to the Senator that he is absolutely mistaken about that, because battleships and submarines are built by money appropriated by Congress and under the direction of the department which sees that the money is honestly expended.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the Senator is correct in that; I may have made a mistake there; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have appropriated something like $640,000,000 for the aviation service. As I recall the bill, it does not specify what kind of a machine shall be built.

Mr. HARDWICK. The committee would not have anything to do with the plan of the machine.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But the committee would, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, if the Senator from Delaware will pardon me, one of the arguments made by the Senator from Oklahoma when he offered this amendment was that very thing as to the appropriation of $640,000,000 for aviation; that he was informed they were going to build so many machines, and if so they would cost twice as much.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. WOLCOTT. In a moment. I thank the Senator from Mississippi for his suggestion. The author of the amendment knows better what it means than its supporters now on this floor. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. As far as the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma about aeroplanes is concerned, that was in connection with an amendment he offered to the aviation bill, as was stated by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, it is unquestionably true, in my judgment, that if this committee has authority to supervise expenditures made in the conduct of war it can supervise the expenditure of the $640,000,000. If it can supervise that, it can investigate how it is being spent, and that committee can sit and conclude that in its judgment the money is being unwisely spent, because, for instance, a certain type of airship is being built when really another type is better. There is no question about that. It can also inquire into the wisdom of the expenditure in the matter of organizing the Aviation Corps, whether there are enough fliers, whether there are enough mechanics, or what not. The committee of Senators and Representatives can undertake to deal with all the expert and technical questions involved in the expenditure of these vast sums of money.

Mr. President, I have consumed more time than I intended to consume. On the 23d of July the President wrote to Mr. Representative LEVER a letter which I desire to read. In this letter he criticized this section 23 that I am discussing. The President's language is as follows:

> Section 23 is not only entirely foreign to the subject matter of the food-administration bill in which it is incorporated, but would, if enacted into law, render my task of conducting the war practically impossible. I can not believe that those who proposed this section scrutinized it with care or analyzed the effects which its operation would necessarily have. The constant supervision of executive action which it contemplates would amount to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the executive work of the administration.
> There is a very ominous precedent in our history which shows how such a supervision would operate. I refer to the committee on the conduct of the war constituted by the Congress during the administration of Mr. Lincoln. It was the cause of constant and distressing harassment and rendered Mr. Lincoln's task all but impossible.

Mr. President, I think the statement made by the President in this letter is justified by the facts. As I said a moment ago, when this matter was first broached it appealed to me in rather a favorable light, but when I heard of a committee on the conduct of the war in the Civil War times it further occurred to me that it might be profitable to investigate the operations of that committee and to endeavor to see if I could find some historical estimate of the work of that committee and the appraisal of it made by the historians who have undertaken to comment upon it. As I pursued that investigation I became convinced of the thorough unwisdom of the creation of such a committee in this war.

The other day in the Senate I believe the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] referred to the fact that the Civil War committee received some sort of an approving word from Nicolay and Hay in their very admirable Life of Lincoln. That is true, Mr. President. I desire to read the comment of Nicolay and Hay upon the Joint Committee upon the Conduct of the War created in 1861. This quotation I get from Volume V, page 150, Nicolay and Hay's Life of Lincoln:

> This committee, known as the Committee on the Conduct of the War, was for four years one of the most important agencies in the country. It assumed, and was sustained by Congress in assuming, a great range of prerogative. It became a stern and zealous censor of both the Army and the Government; it called soldiers and statesmen before it and questioned them like refractory schoolboys. It claimed to speak for the loyal people of the United States, and this claim generally met with the sympathy and support of a majority of the people's Representatives in Congress assembled. It was often hasty and unjust in its judgments, but always earnest, patriotic, and honest. It was assailed with furious denunciation and defended with most long and indiscriminating eulogy; and, on the whole, it must be said to have merited more praise than blame.

That is one of the flattering comments, if such it can be called, I find touching the work of that committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I ought to say that when Nicolay and Hay made that statement we ought to bear in mind the intimate relationship they sustained to the President. Certainly the committee must have done some very good service in that time.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The Senator desires to be fair. I have no personal interest in this matter. I should like to ask the Senator if he approved the work of the Committee on the Conduct of the War in 1861?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President, I was still "standing around the anteroom of the world waiting to be born" when that committee was created, to quote somebody else's expression. I only know of it historically. I do not know whether it did good work or did bad work, but it has just as much to do with the question in hand as the history of the fall of Sodom and Gomorrah has to do with the formation of the Constitution of the United States. Because there was a committee created in the sixties to supervise the method of conducting the war, to directly interfere with and report upon the military operations, certainly can not have anything to do with a proposition on behalf of Congress now to appoint a committee to ascertain whether the money of the people which Congress appropriates is being spent in accordance with law.

I do not agree with the Senator's claim that any committee created under the terms of this bill could ever assume to go any length the Senator has stated. If it did, it would abuse its power. I am not ready to assert that both Houses of Congress are composed of men so unpatriotic, so unjust, so unfair that they would seek to interfere improperly. The fact that Mr. Wade and some other gentlemen did something on some other committee 50 or 60 years ago does not have much to do with this case.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I think it has a great deal to do with it. I think we are entitled to refer to the work of that committee in order to gain information as to what human nature, in whosoever's breast it is reposed, is apt to do under like circumstances. I do not mean to assail the Civil War committee as being composed of men who were conspiring to do things against the success of the Union arms. If this committee were appointed by this Congress with like power I would not for a single moment question the uprightness of purpose and patriotism of every man on it, but I do know as a matter of fact, that in great emergencies where great issues are at stake men get positive opinions and they get very set in their opinions, and if other people do not agree with them they raise a great howl about it and lay it before the public and argue the case before the public.

The best illustration of what I am saying has been furnished by the Senate in the last month or so. It will not do to say that this committee, because the language creating it is innocent looking, may not do the extreme things which I have supposed. In my opinion it is on a like basis with the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War created in 1861.

I resume the thread of my thought in quoting some criticism of the Civil War committee. I shall not read again the quotation that was put in the RECORD by the junior Senator from Massachusetts July 24, which appears on page 5965 of the RECORD.

I ask leave that that quotation from W. O. Stoddard, who was one of the secretaries at the White House in Lincoln's administration, be inserted at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> It was not long before the "legislative branch" of the Government began to interfere with the "executive branch" in military matters. It was little more patriotic than constitutional, but Mr. Lincoln had no manner of objection. When, in December, 1861, Congress appointed a strong and capable "Committee on the Conduct of the War," its members were at once taken into hearty and intimate consultation. What would surely have been a peril or a hindrance to a weak or selfish ruler was transformed at once into an additional and powerful guaranty of congressional cooperation. It was not so much thenceforward that Congress had assumed a part of the executive province, but that the Executive had deftly provided himself with personal and official representatives upon the floor of Senate and House.
> This committee, constantly advised with, cordially invited to investigate, to consider, to come and to go, and to know everything before it happened, became a priceless safety valve for the growing discontent over inexplicable delays. Without it there can now be little question that Mr. Lincoln would have been seriously misunderstood and even antagonized by the body of men nominally represented by the committee.
> The President of the United States is constitutionally the Commander in Chief, and Abraham Lincoln was also actually dictator; but he was entirely at ease as to all his rights and dignities when a joint committee of Senators and Representatives freely summoned before them his military officers by the dozen, and called for their views of things in general and their professional opinions of battles and campaigns. He knew beforehand that the sure result would be the strong and unanimous sympathy of that "jury" of clear-headed men with him personally and their approval of the general outlines of his policy, however much they might disagree among themselves or with him as to details of specific operations.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, when we were discussing the draft bill in the Senate I was particularly impressed with the fact that Maj. Gen. Emory Upton was more frequently quoted than any other author or any other commentator upon military matters. His work, The Military Policy of the United States, was frequently relied upon in the debates as ultimate authority. I wish to lay before the Senate the estimate of this sort of committee which was made by Maj. Gen. Upton on page 316 of his work. Gen. Upton says:

> Had the investigation [of the Committee on the Conduct of the War] been confined to transactions which had already occurred, no harm would have ensued beyond the injury done to discipline by encouraging officers to criticize their superiors with a view to securing promotion or to gratification of personal ill will. But a knowledge of past events by no means satisfied the committee. It pried into the present and sought to look into the future. With but little or no regard for secrecy, it did not hesitate to summon commanders of armies in the field, who were asked and encouraged to disclose the numbers of their troops and their plans of campaign.

At a later place in his work, on page 319, he recites the fact that on—

> January 26, 1863, the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War was instructed to inquire whether Gen. Burnside had, since the Battle of Fredericksburg, formed any plans for moving the Army of the Potomac.

Gen. Upton proceeded with his criticism, as follows:

> The committee, which had so often furnished valuable information to the enemy by laying bare official secrets, was not long in getting at the facts.

Mr. President, I do not take it that Maj. Gen. Upton indicted that committee with deliberately ascertaining the facts to lay them before the enemy, but that committee, I think, as a reading of the report will show, was working through the agency of publicity to accomplish its purpose. It had no power given to it except to investigate, and it could not accomplish anything, except in so far as it laid the facts before the public and brought public opinion to bear upon officials. That being the modus operandi, necessarily secrets leaked out and great harm was done to the Union in the conduct of the war.

A few more quotations, Mr. President, and I shall yield the floor. I think the editorial read from the New York Times referred to Gideon Welles, the then Secretary of the Navy under President Lincoln. From his diary I wish to quote a few excerpts. He says in volume 1, page 262, of his diary:

* * * The report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War is to-day published. This method of supervising military operations by legislative committee is of more than questionable utility. Little good can be expected of these partisan supervisors of the Government at any time. They are partisan and made up of persons not very competent to form correct and intelligent opinions of Army or Navy operations, or administrative purposes. In this instance, I think, from a slight look into a few pages, there is more truth from them than usual in these cases.

On page 198 of Volume II, he says:

* * * Senator Wade called on me yesterday and was, as he always has been with me, very pleasant and affable. I think, however, the old man is a little acrimonious toward the President. He is chairman of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, with Chandler, Gooch, etc. It is a convenient machine to cover up what the War Department wishes to have covered up, and it can be directed against those that the War Department would assail. It is a child of Stanton's. * * *

On page 224 of Volume II he further says:

* * * The Committee on the Conduct of the War have summoned him [Gen Butler] to Washington. There was mischief in this. He had been ordered by the President to Lowell. The President yielded. It was well, perhaps, for Butler was off duty. But in Washington he will help the mischief-makers make trouble and stimulate intrigue and faction. Allied with Wade and Chandler and H. Winter Davis, he will not only aid but breed mischief. This is intended. * * *

Further, on page 226 of the same volume, he says:

* * * Gen. Butler called on me this p. m. He has come to testify before the Committee on the Conduct of the War—called probably on his own suggestion—greatly preferring Washington, for the present at least, to Lowell. I am sorry he has come here. It is for no good or patriotic purpose, I apprehend. As for the "Committee on the Conduct of the War," who have brought him here, they are most of them narrow and prejudiced partisans, mischievous busybodies, and a discredit to Congress. Mean and contemptible partisanship colors all their acts. Secretly opposed to the President, they hope to make something of Butler, who has ability and is a good deal indignant. I am not disposed to do injustice to Butler, nor do I wish to forget the good service he has rendered, but I can not be his partisan, nor do I think the part he acted in the Wilmington expedition justifiable. He does not state clearly what his expectations and intentions were but is clear and unequivocal in his opinion that Fort Fisher could not be taken except by siege, for which he had no preparation. Gen. Grant could not have been of that opinion, or a siege train would have been sent. In a half hour's conversation he made no satisfactory explanation, although ingenious and always ready with an answer.

G. F. R. Henderson, in his work entitled "The Science of War," a collection of essays and lectures written from 1892 to 1903, makes this comment upon this Civil War committee:

* * * It is hardly necessary to comment on the extraordinary means adopted by the Federal Government to ascertain the fitness of the military chiefs, the congressional committee on the war, before which subordinate generals were examined as to the conduct of their commander and encouraged to express their opinions on his ability, his strategy, and his tactics, with all the freedom that envy could suggest. The "Century" papers teem with instances of disobedience, of argument, and of hostile criticism on plans of battle, and the reader of such campaigns as that of Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, and Murfreesboro can realize for himself the disastrous results of such breaches of discipline in the higher ranks.

This committee in the Civil War times, Mr. President, was appointed primarily to investigate the disaster at Balls Bluff. That was the particular incitement to the appointment of the committee. Col. Baker, who was a Senator from Oregon—and a very eloquent and able Senator—was given command of that particular expedition under Gen. Stone. Col. Baker was killed on the field. As Senators will recollect, of course, it was a very disastrous undertaking. The Union troops were up on the bluff, on high land, surrounded by woods on three sides, and when the Confederates opened fire they drove them back over the precipice.

There were very few transports, the number being inadequate to carry them back, and they were killed, slaughtered, and drowned.

There was an investigation of that disaster by the Committee on the Conduct of the War. They made no recommendation; but one day while Gen. Stone was in the field, at the head of his troops, he was summarily arrested upon the order of Gen McClellan. He demanded to know the charge against him, but he was not told. He was carried to prison in New York and there languished, bombarding his superior officers and the War Department and the President with telegrams demanding why he was under arrest. Eventually he was released, because, Mr. President, forsooth, there was not time to try him! Such a release as that convicts that arrest as a gross outrage.

Why was he so arrested? The records show that he was arrested by Gen. McClellan, who acted upon instructions from Secretary Stanton; and Stanton said he acted upon the solicitation of the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War. The first thing this committee undertook to do resulted in the perpetration of an outrage on an honorable officer. So its career started.

Morse, in his Life of Lincoln, Volume I, says:

Stone, a military man by education, deserved censure, but he was treated in a manner so cruel, so unjust, and so disproportionate to his deserts that his error has been condoned in sympathy for his wrongs. The injustice was chargeable chiefly to Stanton, in part to the Committee on the Conduct of the War. Apparently Lincoln desired to know as little as possible about a wrong which he could not set right without injury to the public interests.

Gen. Francis Winthrop Palfrey, who was a Massachusetts volunteer and was brevetted brigadier general of volunteers for gallant conduct at Antietam, in The Antietam and Fredericksburg (Campaigns of Civil War Series), at page 182, says of the Committee on the Conduct of the War that "the worst spirit of the inquisition characterized their doings."

James Kendall Hosmer, author of the work entitled "The Appeal to Arms," which is one of the thirty-odd volumes of the American Nation edited by Albert Bushnell Hart, says, as follows:

It—

The Committee on the Conduct of the War—

played a great part thenceforth throughout the war. Its zeal often outran its discretion, sometimes with unfortunate, even appalling, results; but it was laborious and well-purposed, and sometimes accomplished good.

John T. Morse, jr., at another point in his work on Abraham Lincoln, in the American Statesmen Series, at page 321, appraises this committee as follows:

It was in December, 1861, that Congress created the famous Committee on the Conduct of the War, to some of whose doings it has already been necessary to allude. The gentlemen who were placed upon it were selected partly, of course, for political reasons, and were men who had made themselves conspicuous for their enthusiasm and vehemence; not one of them had any military knowledge. The committee magnified its office almost beyond limit—

Mr. President, if I may inject a remark, the committee proposed to be appointed under this amendment may by the broad grant of power likewise magnify its office beyond limit, as did the Civil War Committee on the Conduct of the War. Resuming the quotation, it—investigated everything; haled whom it chose to testify before it; made reports, expressed opinions, insisted upon policies and measures in matters military; and all with a dictatorial assumption and self-confidence which could not be devoid of effect, although everyone knew that each individual member was absolutely without fitness for the business. So the committee made itself a great power, and therefore also a great complication, in the war machinery; and though it was sometimes useful, yet upon a final balancing of its long account it failed to justify its existence, as, indeed, was to have been expected from the outset.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate longer. I will call the attention of the Senate, however, to the fact that there was such a proposal as this introduced in the British Parliament during the pending war, and was there rejected because a committee on expenditures made in the course of the conduct of the war necessarily means a committee that can at least by investigation and publicity interfere with the conduct of that war in some manner or other.

I thought, Mr. President, that I owed it to the Senate to submit these views upon this proposition. When it was introduced in the Senate it was near the time when the debate on the food bill was about to close, and the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as amended by the substitute of the Senator from Oklahoma, was adopted without a single word of discussion or comment. Therefore I thought it advisable to lay before the Senate the information which I have given.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has made a very interesting review, and concluded with the statement that a motion was defeated to establish such a committee in the House of Commons. I ask the Senator to state what committee it was that investigated the conditions of the war in Mesopotamia and Gallipoli and reported so conclusively and so strikingly of the miscarriage of those two great enterprises?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know. There was no committee acting under authority to investigate expenditures, however, because that sort of a proposition was defeated. I think, Mr. President, there might arise occasions during the course of the present war when some disaster might occur when it would be proper for Congress to investigate; but what I am opposed to is that there shall be created a committee with full power to go ahead and investigate for itself to make itself, so to speak, a clearing house for all the gossip mongers and quidnuncs that might be running around trying to make trouble. The Congress ought to commit itself to specific investigations and not commit itself to the general proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do.

Mr. KING. In reply to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], if the Senator from Delaware will pardon me, the commission which was appointed to investigate the Mesopotamia campaign was a mixed one. There were, as I remember, one or two judges of the higher courts of Great Britain and several officers, and I think one or more civilians. Charges were made that Sir Richard Hardinge and others had mismanaged that campaign, and in answer to the demand for an investigation a mixed commission of the character to which I have just referred was appointed. They made a thorough investigation with respect to the Mesopotamia campaign and submitted a full report thereon. My recollection is that a similar commission was appointed to investigate the Gallipoli campaign.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has consented that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may consider two conference reports, amending the interstate commerce act. I imagine there will be no discussion regarding them. They are unanimous reports, and I have heard of no indication of any opposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is rather late to take those reports up to-night, but I have not heard of any opposition to them. I do not desire to call for a quorum to-night, and I am not going to do so if the Senator will assure me that the Committee on Interstate Commerce was united upon the report. Was any member of the committee opposed to the conference report?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not heard of any member of the committee who was opposed to it. The conferees on both sides were unanimous.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the conferees were; but I asked the Senator whether there was a member of the committee who was opposed to it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not heard of any.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator one more question. In what respect is the conference report different from the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. NEWLANDS. With reference to the bill enlarging the Interstate Commerce Commission, the principal change was with reference to the so-called Smith amendment, providing that no rate should be increased without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The House conferees were opposed to that provision in the Senate bill, and a compromise was reached upon consultation with the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is contained in the following proviso in section 4:

SEC. 4. That paragraph 2, section 15, of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding the following: "Provided further, Until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission. Such approval may, in the discretion of the commission, be given without formal hearing, and in such case shall not affect any subsequent proceeding relative to such rate, fare, charge, or classification."

It was insisted by the House conferees that the joint congressional committee would take up this subject and perfect legislation regarding it, and that, therefore, this legislation is made effective only until January 1, 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. That is in relation to the increase of the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, as to the regulatory part of the bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. As to that, I think that some changes were made, although they were not very important. The word "consideration" was substituted for the word "hearing," used in the Senate bill, and the word "hearings" was stricken out and "proceedings" substituted.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to mean that the real substance of the Senate amendment was agreed to in conference, and that the only changes made were in words that did not affect the substance of the Senate amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The language of the Senate bill was changed somewhat with a view to securing a review by the full commission of the decisions of the subdivisions of the commission, but that was simply in the way of perfecting the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. With that explanation, I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 1816, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"That section 24 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members, with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10 000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the members and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1921, and one for a term expiring December 31, 1922. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.'

"SEC. 2. That section 17 of said act, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 17. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, or before any division of the commission, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the commission or any division thereof and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission, or of any division thereof, shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"'The commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be denominated, respectively, division 1, division 2, etc. Any commissioner may be assigned to and may serve upon such division or divisions as the commission may direct, and the senior in service of the commissioners constituting any of said division shall act as chairman thereof. In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any commissioner thereto assigned, the chairman of the commission, or any commissioner designated by him for that purpose, may temporarily serve on said division until the commission shall otherwise order.

"'The commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, or functions arising under this act, or under any act amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, or under any amendment which may be made to any of said acts, or under any other act or joint resolution which has been or may hereafter be approved, or in respect of any matter which has been or may be referred to the commission by Congress or by either branch thereof, be assigned or referred to any of said divisions for action thereon, and may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such direction. All such orders shall take effect forthwith and remain in effect until otherwise ordered by the commission.

"'In conformity with and subject to the order or orders of the commission in the premises, each division so constituted shall have power and authority by a majority thereof to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any of said work, business, or functions so assigned or referred to it for action by the commission, and in respect thereof the division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. Any order, decision, or report made or other action taken by any of said divisions in respect of any matters so assigned or referred to it shall have the same force and effect, and may be made, evidenced, and enforced in the same manner as if made or taken by the commission, subject to rehearing by the commission, as provided in section 16a hereof for rehearing cases decided by the commission. The secretary and seal of the commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof.

"'In all proceedings before any such divisions relating to the reasonableness of rates or to alleged discriminations not less than three members shall participate in the consideration and decision; and in all proceedings relating to the valuation of railway property under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities," approved March 1, 1913, not less than five members shall participate in the consideration and decision.

"'The salary of the secretary of the commission shall be $5,000 per annum.

"'Nothing in this section contained or done pursuant thereto shall be deemed to divest the commission of any of its powers.'

"SEC. 3. So much of section 18 of the act to regulate commerce as fixes the salary of the secretary of the commission is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 4. That paragraph 2, section 15, of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding the following: 'Provided further, Until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission. Such approval may, in the discretion of the commission, be given without formal hearing, and in such case shall not affect any subsequent proceeding relative to such rate, fare, charge, or classification.'"

And the House agree to the same.

JOE T. ROBINSON,
ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. C. ADAMSON,
T. W. SIMS,
JOHN J. ESCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I call up the conference report on the priority-of-shipments bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 2356, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"That section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended by adding thereto the following:

"'That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war in which the United States is now engaged, knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation by threats of physical force obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest requires, to employ the armed forces of the United States to prevent any such obstruction or retardation of the passage of the mail, or of the orderly conduct or movement of interstate or foreign commerce in any part of the United States, or of any train, locomotive, car, or other vehicle upon any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

"'That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as, in his judgment, may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carrier by railroad, water, or otherwise. He may give these directions at and for such times as he may determine, and may modify, change, suspend, or annul them, and for any such purpose he is hereby authorized to issue orders direct, or through such person or persons as he may designate for the purpose or through the Interstate Commerce Commission. Officials of the United States, when so designated, shall receive no compensation for their services rendered hereunder. Persons not in the employ of the United States so designated shall receive such compensation as the President may fix. Suitable offices may be rented, and all necessary expenses, including compensation of persons so designated, shall be paid as directed by the President out of funds which may have been or may be provided to meet expenditures for the national security and defense. The common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, or as many of them as desire so to do, are hereby authorized without responsibility or liability on the part of the United States, financial or otherwise, to establish and maintain in the city of Washington during the period of the war an agency empowered by such carriers as join in the arrangement to receive on behalf of them all notice and service of such orders and directions as may be issued in accordance with this act, and the service upon such agent shall be good service as to all the carriers joining in the establishment thereof. And it shall be the duty of any and all the officers, agents, or employees of such carriers by railroad or water or otherwise to obey strictly and conform promptly to such orders, and failure knowingly and willfully to comply therewith, or to do or perform whatever is necessary to the prompt execution of such order, shall render such officers, agents, or employees guilty of a misdemeanor, and any such officer, agent, or employee shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. For the transportation of persons or property in carrying out the orders and directions of the President, just and reasonable rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the transportation be for the Government of the United States, it shall be paid for currently or monthly by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds not otherwise appropriated. Any carrier complying with any such order or direction for preference or priority herein authorized shall be exempt from any and all provisions in existing law imposing civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities upon carriers by reason of giving preference or priority in compliance with such order or direction."

And the House agree to the same.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 7, 1917.

(Legislative day of Saturday, August 4, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are very few Senators in the Chamber, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Myers	Simmons
Bankhead	Husting	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	James	New	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Page	Smoot
Culberson	Kellogg	Penrose	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Pittman	Thompson
Dillingham	Kenyon	Poindexter	Underwood
Fernald	King	Pomerene	Vardaman
Fletcher	Kirby	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Gronna	Knox	Shafroth	Warren
Harding	McKellar	Sheppard	Weeks
Hardwick	McNary	Sherman	Williams

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is absent on account of a death in his family. I desire this announcement to stand for the day. I should have made it yesterday, but was myself necessarily detained on public business and was not present at the time of the roll call.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is absent on account of illness. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is perhaps well for the Senate of the United States even, august body as it is, to have some inkling of information about what the country is thinking. I cut out of this morning's paper an interview from Oscar S. Straus, one of the most distinguished Republican citizens of the United States. He is an ex-Cabinet officer; was Secretary of Commerce. He has done great and valuable work for the Red Cross and for a hundred other philanthropic institutions. He possesses one of the most acute intellects that I ever came in contact with. Republican, ex-Cabinet officer under a Republican administration, this is what he has to say; and I recommend it as intellectual pabulum to this body:

"There is no politics in this country now except on Capitol Hill," added Mr. Straus. "The people out in the country are not thinking of or talking politics. They are standing squarely behind the President, and I want to say that now I am an administration man. I have no politics at this time. I think President Wilson has risen nobly to the occasion. His is the master mind, and he will be the forward leader when the time comes for making peace. I think the President is one of the great figures of the world."

I said upon yesterday that I was rapidly coming to the conclusion it was about time we were forgetting during the war partisan alignments in this body, and I am glad to say that a majority of the Democratic Party and a majority of the Republican Party have forgotten them. But there is a little group of men on each side who have formed themselves into a sort of a third party—antiadministration and, in a certain sense, anti-American—who have somehow, whether consciously or unconsciously, placed themselves in the attitude either of obstructing or delaying or opposing everything that goes to seeing this trouble through to a victorious issue—this great world trouble in which we are engaged. I am rather of the opinion now that it will be very well if the great majority party of this Senate, composed of Republicans and Democrats both, could get together and say to these two little groups, "You have danced your ballet; you have sung your song. America is tired of you; we are tired of you, and we want to do something."

In this connection I wish to read, leaving out the title and leaving out parts which I think are unjust to individual Senators, something from the New York Sun:

To-day's—

Referring to yesterday—

To-day's acrimonious debate on the food-bill conference report left not a doubt of that—

That is, of the fact that those who were delaying war measures would be "smoked out," and made known to the American people, whom they misrepresent.

It showed that the men who want the United States to win this war and who are contributing everything in their power to that end are sick and tired of the tactics of the pro-German obstructionists.

FIGHTING ALL WAR MOVES.

This group of Senators from the very beginning of the war have sought to delay what they could not defeat. They have stood out as men apart.

The balance of that I will not read but continue the reading where it is parliamentary:

It might seem inconceivable that any respectable group of American lawmakers would or could array themselves against their Government at such a time, seeking to cripple the President and handicap the country in the mobilization of its war resources; yet there is such a group. Everybody who has followed the course of legislation for the past four months knows that there is.

* * * * * * *

It has continued its work of obstruction ever since and is still finding means of tying the hands of the administration.

SENATE'S PATIENCE STRAINED.

The Senate is a patient body. It stands for a great deal of abuse of individual privilege. It refused for more than 100 years to apply even a cloture. Now that it may slap the gag upon the man or men who deliberately kill valuable time with meaningless declaration or perfervid protest, it still hesitates to "abridge the right of debate." But occasionally the worm turns, and occasionally some Member lets himself loose, with the result that the dignified Chamber is filled for the time with forked lightning.

* * * * * * *

Both the House and Senate are facing the same issue, raised by the pro-German Members of those bodies. It may be an unpleasant thing for a Congressman or a Senator to expose the unpatriotic course of a fellow Member, but national necessity requires that it be done, just as national necessity demands that a powerful army be marshaled and a formidable navy be built and equipped for defense.

It is well for the Senate to hear what the country thinks. Here is some more of it. This is from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, which I am informed is a Democratic paper, though I do not know:

With Germany in control of a triumphant and insolent military autocracy, no peace can be made that would not be a mere truce, preparatory to another war. It would be a peace which ignored the fundamental issue upon which we entered the war.

By the way, I ask the Reporter to take down what I read, leaving out all matters personal in their character, which I do not read:

Opening a discussion of peace, therefore, at the time when we are just beginning to fight and on a basis of ignoring all for which we are fighting indicates shameful weakness. It embarrasses and hampers the administration in the conduct of the war and contributes to the postponement of any kind of peace.

What the persistent advocates of peace in Great Britain and the United States are incapable of understanding is that if this war is not fought to a finish and does not result in a free Germany there can be no real peace for anybody in the world. While the existing German system remains no Government can hereafter rely upon German pledges or German treaties. All the democratic nations will have to put themselves upon a military basis and keep themselves armed to the teeth. They will be obliged to make their preparations for war such that their armies and navies will be ready at 24 hours' notice, and civilization at peace will be subjected to a burden of military taxes hardly less formidable than civilization at war. Any kind of peace that enables Prussianism to maintain itself at home is a victory for German autocracy. The Kaiser sees it clearly enough, even if there are Americans and Englishmen and Frenchmen who are blind to the vital facts of the war.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary read at the desk an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch entitled "Autocracy's twilight," which gives the view from the other side of the water which these newspapers are giving from this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

AUTOCRACY'S TWILIGHT.

"German blood and German zeal are not being gambled with for an empty shadow of ambition or schemes of conquest and subjugation, but in defense of a strong, free empire in which our children may live in security," says the Kaiser in a fervent appeal to the German people to stand by him and his army.

Chancellor Michaelis assures the people that when the Emperor returns from the front he will push internal reforms which the people are demanding.

The Kaiser is beginning to see the light. Imperial ambitions are fading under heavy disappointments on land and sea. The schemes of conquest and subjugation do not seem so alluring in the twilight of military autocracy. He must do something to satisfy the people who under unendurable miseries and burdens are beginning to question the motives and methods of their masters.

He assures them that they are not being exploited for the glory of the Hohenzollerns and the gain of junkerdom. He assures them that the freedom for which they yearn will be doled out to them and the voice in the government they seek will be theirs—some time.

Why does the Kaiser shift from imperial proclamations to fervent appeals, from boasts to pleas and promises?

The shadow of the giant Republic of the West is falling over his throne. He knows that through America's entrance into war he stands indicted before the bar of world opinion as the enemy of mankind, a pariah among Governments. He knows he must soon meet the giant, fresh and vigorous, armed and powerful, and must answer to him for his crimes of oppression and inhumanity. He knows that he is not dealing now with little Belgium, weak Serbia, rash and feeble Roumania, or distracted and faction-torn Russia. He knows that he is dealing with the strongest, most energetic, most resourceful people in the world. He knows he is dealing with determined freemen who have never known defeat.

Our speedy, large preparation on all lines of warfare—on sea, on land, and in the air—has convinced the Kaiser and his political and military lieutenants that we mean business and that within a year his war-worn, sadly thinned armies will have to meet a great force of Americans continually augmented by fresh reserves from a 10,000,000 draft. Already his submarines have to contend with American warships, which have just begun operations. Already the machines are humming in the manufacture of a huge fleet of aeroplanes, and the aviation fields are training thousands of aviators.

Not only has our entrance into the war assured victory, but our rapid vast preparations and our vigorous prosecution of war hasten peace.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there sounds the voice of genuine Americanism, with no party and no section. There is no North, South, East, West, Democrat or Republican in it.

This is not a partisan domestic question; this is an international question. This is not a question between Woodrow Wilson and Congress; this is not a question between the American administration and some Americans, unless those Americans are disloyal. This is a question between America and Germany. It is time that the men in this Chamber were lining themselves up, forgetting all alignments of a partisan character, as pro-administrationists, pro-Americans, or else frankly and bravely as antiadministrationists and anti-Americans. I for one am ready to take my stand. Everybody who knows me knows that I am a dyed-in-the-wool Bourbon Democrat, but when a great international question—a great international struggle—like this confronts the entire American people, when my boys must go to the front, to be maimed or to be killed, and the boys of other citizens, equally worthy and in many cases more so, must go, I confess to a little bit of impatience with the men who can not realize the situation.

Those of you who followed Roosevelt, follow him now. He is setting you an example. Those of you who followed Taft, follow him now. He is setting you an example. Those of us who have followed Woodrow Wilson, and would follow him to the death, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, let us follow him now. He is setting a glorious and loyal and able example. All three of them have proven their Americanism. As far as this war is concerned, and as far as war legislation is concerned—as far as these measures are concerned, which have been sent here for the purpose of carrying on the war, directly by military and naval forces, or indirectly by the mobilization of our civil strength, whether of food conservation or otherwise—those three men might just as well be standing upon the same platform. They are all "speaking the language of the tribe"—the language of the American tribe. They are tired, the country is tired, two-thirds of this Senate even are tired, a larger proportion of the other House is tired of constant—Oh, gabble-festing—constant gabbing about nothing—of gentlemen intoxicating themselves without even enlivening anybody else, by "the exuberance of their verbosity."

Nobody objects to the right of free speech. Let every man talk all he wants; let every man write what he pleases. Some time ago I got a communication attracting my attention to what is going on in the German-edited newspapers here—absolute spiritual disloyalty. My reply was, "Let them alone; let men talk; let men write. The more they talk and write, the more you find them out; and the more you find them out, the better for you."

I do not object to that, but I should like to know why it is when we come to the consideration of a great bill—and we have come to the consideration of several such—that, except in a very few cases, where the overwhelming sentiment of the American people had previously sounded the alarm, you can not come to an agreement with one another to ascertain when you are going to vote. I regard the pending bill as one of the minor war measures; I care very little about it, except I think it is right in the main, and that it will do good, but the main thing is to vote on it; to get it out of the way; to open the pathway for other things that must come.

We have a great revenue measure which must be passed. It can not pass without some discussion, for it covers too much ground. We have a great bond measure that must follow it. We have a great many other things to consider, and yet you are lagging on here through the dog days, making everybody nervous and irritated and irritable, when your talk is not changing a single vote in the Senate, and when every one of you knows it. I might stand here and talk until I was black in the face, and I would not change the vote of a single man who has already formed his convictions, for reasons that are satisfactory to him, and in the entertainment of which he is doubtless as honest as am I, and he might possibly treble what he says and he could not produce any impression on me, because I know what I want, and I know why I want it, and I know that I want it as soon as I can get it, and that is the case with the balance of you. We not only know how we want to vote and know why we want so to vote, but each one of us, in true senatorial dignity and egotism, thinks that he knows it better than anybody else in this Chamber. Now, why use up the time of the American people in this gabble-festing—like ganders hissing at one another on a pond bank to show off before the geese?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am glad that the Senator from Mississippi, with all of his accustomed logic and force, has made an unqualified declaration that the majority shall rule, and he complains that there is a large majority of the Senate which wishes to do certain things but are prevented by a minority who indulge in endless talk.

There was a proposition before the Senate the day the food bill passed relating to the creation of a committee on war expenditures, and it was adopted by a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate, 53 to 31. Of the majority there were 15 Democrats and all the Republicans who voted, and yet the Senator from Mississippi, by voice at least, has attempted ever since to prevent the inclusion of that proposition in the pending legislation. I have no disposition——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts contend that a majority of the Senate is either a majority of the Congress of the United States or a majority of the country? "The Senator from Mississippi" thinks he is standing for the views of a majority of the country and also for the views of a majority of the House.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if we could get a vote on that proposition in the House of Representatives and a majority of the House decided that the action of the Senate was not wise, I would be perfectly content and would make no complaint; but, as a matter of fact, as the Senator from Mississippi knows, no vote can be obtained in the House of Representatives under present conditions, and therefore this proposition, which the Senate by a very large majority believed should be incorporated in this legislation, is going to be lost.

I did not rise to complain of that, because at some other time, perhaps, the Senate and the House will conclude that it is wise to adopt this legislation; but I do want to call attention to the fact that what is a majority opinion here has been and is being opposed by a Senator who is taking to task other Senators who have exercised their right to discuss this legislation.

Mr. President, I submit that in all the fundamental questions relating to the war, such as the declaration of war and providing men and money, there has been practically no difference of opinion, and the legislation providing for them has passed the Senate without any delay. I do not think there was an hour's debate on the question of the declaration of war, and when the Appropriations Committee came in here with a great bill carrying $3,300,000,000 it was passed in an hour and fifteen minutes. In other words, the Congress promptly furnished the President not only with what he asked for—a declaration of war—but with the men and money to carry on the war effectively; but because—and it is not for me to defend any other Senator, for I have not unnecessarily taken any of the time of the Senate in debate—but because Senators see fit to debate what the Senator from Mississippi calls a relatively unimportant measure, which may or may not do some good—and there is a great difference of opinion on that subject—without knowing what the wishes of the country may be, he takes them to task and says that they are not carrying out the wishes of the country.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that the amendment, which, as I understand, was first proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, creating a committee on war expenditures, was not germane to the food bill?

Mr. WEEKS. It was germane or I have no doubt some Senator would have made the point of order against it.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, as the Senator well knows, the point of order of germaneness does not lie in the Senate. That is well known to everybody, and, of course, the Senator understands that. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: Is it not a well-known parliamentary rule that where one House puts in nongermane matter and the other House refuses to yield, rather than to let the bill fail it is the duty of the House that incorporated the nongermane proposition in the measure to yield in order to allow the original question to become a law?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not criticizing the conference committee in this case. I know the difficulties of conference committees; but, if current rumor may be taken as a basis for comment, I should say that the Senate conferees did not make as strong a fight as they should have made for a proposition which had been so signally and forcefully indorsed by the Senate. Yet I have no intention of criticizing them.

Mr. JAMES. But is it not further true—the Senator speaks of the House and what it might have done on a separate vote—that a separate vote practically was had in the House on this very question, as was understood by every Member there; that the opposition to the committee on war expenditures was led by the distinguished Member from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and many of his confrères; and that the majority of the House expresses itself as opposed to this proposed committee?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I can not admit what the Senator from Kentucky seems to think is a correct statement, that the House passed on the merits of this proposition.

Mr. JAMES. While they did not do so directly, it was so understood by the House, and that was declared as the purpose of the leader, Mr. MANN, in asking for a separate vote. So upon this question the House, with that knowledge, voted it down.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator from Kentucky is an important leader in Congress, and I want to ask him if he would be willing to advise his friends in the House of Representatives to bring in a rule to make this proposition in order in the House the next time the House comes together?

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I sat in the House for 10 years and I know how jealous the House is of its rights and of outside interference, and I would not want to undertake to give any advice as to what they ought to do or interfere in any way in their deliberations; but is it not true, I ask the Senator, that the conferees of the House, both the Republicans and Democrats, stood unanimously against the proposition to create a committee on war expenditures which the Senate had adopted?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not as familiar with what happened in the conference as the Senator from Kentucky seems to be.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator must not dodge in that way. Is not my statement true, and is not that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. WEEKS. That is not my understanding; and, moreover, the Senator from Kentucky knows that the conferees are the creatures of the body which appoints them, and that it is the duty of conferees to carry out the purposes of the body they represent.

Mr. JAMES. I know that the conferees are appointed in the House as they are in the Senate, from the ranking members of the committee having jurisdiction of a given measure, as was done in the case of the food bill, and the Republican members on that committee were unanimously in accord with the Democrats in opposing this very question which the Senator is now discussing, namely, the creation of a committee on war expenditures.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think if the Senator from Kentucky will look up the RECORD he will find that the Republican members of the conference in the House, when they voted on the matter in a form which the Senator from Kentucky admits was not exactly a direct vote, supported this proposition. I think he will find that is the case.

Mr. JAMES. Well, the margin of difference is very narrow in the House between the two political parties, but the vote was overwhelming on this proposition against it. So it was not a united Republican vote, at least.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr President, like the Senator from Mississippi, I do not intend to engage in, and I do not believe there should be any attempt to engage in, political discussions about matters relating to the war. I have not done so in the past and I do not propose to do so now; in fact, I do not know any Republican Senator who has done so. Periodically the Senator from Mississippi does assume, through his great influence and his long service, to lecture the Senate on the subject of playing politics, but I think if an examination of the RECORD were made it would be demonstrated that he has taken more time on that particular subject than all other Senators put together during the last 30 days.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refer to some of the statements that have been made relative to the proposed committee on war expenditures, because they have been made frequently without thorough knowledge of the facts and because I think that when this body and the House and the country know what is intended by this legislation there will be a unanimous demand that it be passed.

I introduced the original proposition for a committee, and termed it a "committee on the conduct of the war." I think any Senator who knows me will absolve me from any responsibility for any attempt to embarrass the President of the United States in conducting this war. I have had a military training. I know the folly of any such course as that quite as well as does any other Senator, and nothing was further from my thought when I introduced that general proposition in the month of April than to embarrass the President. I thought it was an opportunity to cooperate with the President, and I believed it would be helpful to the President, I believed it would be helpful to the country; if I had thought otherwise I would not have introduced it at all. I say that because anyone could have found out what my views were in three minutes if he had attempted to do it. But it has been deliberately given out to the country, through the press and from inspired sources, that this was an attempt to embarrass the administration. I deny it in toto. I do not know anyone who has had anything to do with this activity who has desired to embarrass the administration in the slightest degree.

When that resolution was introduced it was referred to the Committee on Rules. If the President had confined his activities strictly to his constitutional duties the Senate and the House would probably have acted on this legislation in April; it would have been adopted or rejected. A hearing was given, a subcommittee was appointed to consider some changes in the draft of the resolution, and the next day the President came to the Capitol and told the Senators who were appointed on that subcommittee that it was undesirable that the legislation should be considered and adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does the Senator mind my correcting him a little in one respect?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has just said that the resolution was referred to a subcommittee for the purpose of considering certain changes in the wording of the resolution. Now, that is not my recollection. It was referred to a committee to consider the resolution—whether it should report it back to the committee favorably or unfavorably, and if it was going to report it favorably, of course, there was left with it the responsibility of amending or modifying it. It was not referred by the Committee on Rules to the subcommittee with the idea of modifying its language, but was sent to the subcommittee to be considered, and it was their duty to report back to the whole committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I left the room after the hearing which was courteously given me, and I have talked to various members of the committee and I believe the statement I made is entirely justified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suggest, then, that the minutes of the committee will show whether the Senator from Massachusetts is right or whether I am right, and I virtually know that I am. Of course, I think that when a man says he knows he is right about anything that proves that he does not know himself, so I will say I think assuredly that I am right.

Mr. WEEKS. In any case, Mr. President, no action was taken by the subcommittee. It never met, and it did not meet for the reason I have stated. That resolution remained in the Committee on Rules until this legislation came up. I did not wish to attempt to take action to discharge the committee, although I believe it is the duty of a committee to make some kind of a report on a proposition of that kind.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows who was chairman of that subcommittee. That chairman did not call the subcommittee together. I was a member of the subcommittee. I was not its chairman. The Senator knows that that chairman prepared his own resolution and submitted it as a substitute for the Senator's resolution, and the Senator accepted it. The Senator knows that the chairman could have called the subcommittee together at any time, and why he did not do it I do not know; but he did not do it.

Mr. WEEKS. The reason he did not do it was because the President came to the Capitol and told the Democratic Senators on that committee that he thought it was inadvisable to have such a committee appointed.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is no reason why the chairman should not have called us together.

Mr. WEEKS. But that is the fact.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the truth. I do not deny that; but I do deny that it is any reason why the chairman should not have called the subcommittee together, and probably it was his duty to call it together to consider it. The Senator was entitled to a report on his resolution, either favorably or unfavorably.

Mr. WEEKS. I think so.

Mr. OVERMAN. And it is not the fault of the committee that there was a failure to call together the subcommittee. Whenever the subcommittee was ready to report the full committee could have been called together and would have been called together. The reason of it was that the chairman of the subcommittee did not call the subcommittee together.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator let me trespass one minute more upon his time?

Mr. WEEKS. I shall be very glad to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know whether it has been mentioned or not, but the chairman of that subcommittee was the author of the resolution which is now before the Senate, and he voted for it subsequently in the committee. I refer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. If there be any fault in not calling the subcommittee together, it was the fault of the author of this very resolution.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, that is no denial of the statement I have made as to why, probably, the subcommittee was not called together. I simply instance that because the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] yesterday, in making some remarks, said that primarily and earlier in the consideration of this proposition it seemed to meet his approval, and then he had a change of heart and a change of mind; that is probably true of other Senators on that side; and the reason is quite apparent.

I want to reiterate that there is not a scintilla of evidence to show that there was or is any desire on the part of any Senator to embarrass the President in the discharge of his duties. Moreover, Mr. President, I should be opposed to the appointment of a committee that would undertake to have anything to do with policies relating to this war. It would be not only harmful to the action of the administration, which is responsible, but it would be trespasssing on the powers of the Executive in an illogical and unwise and unsound way. A majority of this body agreed at one time that this legislation ought to be adopted, and I emphasize that and repeat it because there have appeared editorials, especially in the New York papers, notably one yesterday in the New York Times, rather taking to task those who were in favor of it, because the contention was made that a majority ought to be in control and ought to govern in this matter, and that it was unwise to press a matter which had only a minority behind it, when as a matter of fact the vote was 53 to 31 in favor of the proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows there was no discussion over his amendment when it was introduced. The time for discussion had passed under the unanimous-consent agreement. This amendment was offered, and it was impossible to say a word about it, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, possibly the Senator from North Carolina was not in the Chamber, but I talked as rapidly as I could for 10 minutes about this proposition and in favor of it; and a New York newspaper, which a few days after, when apparently it had received other information, printing an editorial which has been quoted frequently in opposition to this proposition, printed two columns of what I said on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will not deny what I said about it—that the amendment was introduced after the time for discussion had passed.

Mr. WEEKS. I do deny that, Mr. President. Any Senator could have discussed it for 10 minutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I may be mistaken about it, but my understanding was as I have stated.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, has the Senator from Massachusetts any doubt whatever that every Senator, when he voted, knew what he was voting on?

Mr. WEEKS. Not the slightest.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, I have. I doubt it very much.

Mr. WEEKS. This matter had been discussed in the cloakrooms, lobbies, and had been discussed in the press for three months; and, as I have just stated, I discussed it for 10 minutes on the floor, and any other Senator could have done the same thing if he had seen fit to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I was not in the Senate Chamber when he discussed it, and since he says he discussed it I am mistaken; but my recollection is—now, I may be mistaken about that, too—that the amendment was introduced after the time had passed for the discussion of amendments, after 4 o'clock.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the amendment was introduced three days before that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I mean, it was sent to the desk before that time, but it was not called up until after 4 o'clock.

Mr. WEEKS. It was not called up until it was in order, after the committee amendments had been disposed of; but it was called up as soon after that as it was possible to do it. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] reminds me that I introduced the amendment on July 18, and asked that it lie on the table.

Now, I want to refer for a few moments to some of the comments made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] yesterday relative to the committee which was in operation during the Civil War, known as the Committee on the Conduct of the War. That was not an entirely satisfactory committee, and its operations were not entirely satisfactory. The country was in a state of great excitement. The Republican Party, the dominant party, was not a cohesive political organization. It contained various elements—free-soilers, Democrats, Whigs, and others.

They were agreed in one proposition, and that was in their contest against slavery; but, generally speaking, they were not agreed on other fundamental questions which usually govern political party activities. There were violent men in Congress at that time who took violent views of public questions, and quite likely that committee in its activities did some things which were not entirely judicial or wise or sound. I have read pretty nearly everything I can find relating to it, because I became interested in the subject, and I am perfectly willing to admit that the committee was not always above reproach; and yet the entire testimony—and the Senator from Delaware put in the RECORD practically all of the quotations that are obtainable from authors of character and standing—practically the entire testimony is that that committee did more good than it did harm. I think undoubtedly that is the case.

The only two citations which the Senator from Delaware made which I think were at all damaging to the committee's activities were those statements made by Gen. Emory Upton—who was one of the really great military leaders developed by the Civil War, and whose judgment on military questions may well be taken at any time—and by the Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles. Anyone who has read Mr. Welles's diary must have come to the conclusion that he approached very near to the borders of being a common scold. He was in violent antagonism to the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton. Everything that Mr. Stanton did was wrong. Now, Mr. Stanton himself was a man who had faults, but he was a great administrator. Occasionally he did things which I think were unwise and without a sufficient degree of fairness, and yet he was one of the main props of the President during the entire Civil War; and Mr. Welles was led into this criticism of the Committee on the Conduct of the War because he believed that it was the creature of Mr. Stanton.

He made the criticisms of very many of the officers of the northern armies in his diary. Some of these men who stand highest in public estimation to-day met Mr. Welles's disapproval, because he contended that they did not want to finish the war; that they were desirous of prolonging it, for the reason that they had a higher rank and more pay under war conditions than they had under peace conditions.

I think both of those citations—that of Gen. Upton and that of Mr. Welles—can be left with that general statement. In the other cases cited by the Senator from Delaware there was more approval of what had been done than disapproval, and it is worth mentioning that not another member of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet made any reference in a disparaging way to the operations of this committee during the war.

Does anyone think the loyalty of the men in those Cabinets was such that they would not have been ready to criticize this committee if it had been embarrassing Mr. Lincoln? There is no doubt about that, and no word escaped him which indicated that he objected to it in any way. And yet the reason for that committee and its operations really has nothing to do with and no real bearing on this proposition.

At that time the North had in the field a series of commanders who were—well, I will use the word "incompetent," Mr. President, and I think that is rather milder than a description of them should be. If anyone will study the battles fought by the Army of the Potomac in the earlier days of the war, he will be amazed at the lack of military preparation. This Civil War movement was started as a result of the calamity which happened at Balls Bluff, in which case there were 30,000 northern troops within 12 miles of that battle field, and yet a few men were sent across the Potomac in a few scows, not enough to convey more than 100 or 200 men at a time, to meet an enemy two or three times the size of the advancing force.

It was believed at the time, and the testimony indicates it, that if the commander of our Army had ordered those 30,000 men—the divisions of McCall and the other commander whose name I do not recall at this moment—to that field, as should have been done, to protect those who were crossing the river; or if he had made his attack in that way, it undoubtedly would have succeeded. Naturally the North were outraged when they saw at least a thousand of the very flower of the States that they represented sacrificed in an attack for which sufficient preparation had not been made or any commensurable result obtained. Moreover, the loss in that battle was not only a thousand men killed or drowned, but the loss of a great political leader, a Member of the United States Senate, who had appealed to the public imagination by his action in behalf of the Union, attracted public attention to this affair in a way which otherwise probably would not have resulted.

The investigations made by this committee in the early days of the war of the military commanders and their operations were undoubtedly justified. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] quoted with approval yesterday from Gen. John G. Palfrey, of Massachusetts, who has written most intelligently of the Civil War. Gen. Palfrey states, in an analysis of several of the battles of the war, that there were actually no definite orders given by the commander of the Army of the Potomac at the Battle of Fredericksburg, so that parts of his command did not know what other parts were to do; that it was a "go-as-you-please" fight, and that if concerted effort had been made the result might have been very different. That is true in other cases in connection with the operations of this Army at about that time.

But, as I have said, Mr. President, there is really no comparison between what that committee did and what this committee might do. What this committee ought to do is to keep in touch with the expenditure of the vast amounts of money which are being appropriated by Congress. Why, the whole Civil War, fought through four years, only cost three and a half billions of dollars; while before this session of Congress adjourns we will appropriate or provide in some form for the expenditure of $17,000,000,000. When we look back to the Civil War period and see the waste that resulted in the expenditure of that three and a half billion dollars, can it be possible that we are going to be justified in fighting this war without knowing anything about how this vast amount is being expended or whether it is being wisely expended? I say not; and, Mr. President, unless Congress is going to take a strong hand and see that this money is not wasted, the people of this country will pillory every man who is responsible for the waste which is likely to result unless Congress is kept informed.

I maintain, Mr. President, and I have always done so, that nine-tenths of the trouble of the people of the country is lack of publicity. There is no publicity to-day in connection with these expenditures. There should not be any publicity in many cases, yet we all know that the recommendations of the department are coming in here without serious consideration by those who recommend them, that they are being put through the appropriations committees without the careful consideration which is given to appropriation bills in normal times, and that vast amounts of money are undoubtedly being appropriated which may not be needed for the purpose for which the appropriation is being made. I need but recall the instance in the $3,300,000,000 appropriation to which I have previously referred, relating to the purchase of horses. The recommendation of the War Department was for $73,500,000, yet when that question was discussed five minutes on the floor of the Senate an amendment was offered substituting $25,000,000 for $73,500,000. It was taken to conference, referred to the War Department, and the War Department replied that $25,000,000 would be sufficient for its purposes. In other words, we would have appropriated $48,500,000 more than was required if the point had not been made that Cavalry was not being used in France. I do not say that all that money would have been expended or that it would all have been wastefully expended even if it had been spent, but I do say in giving unlimited power and unlimited amounts of money to expend, unless human nature has entirely changed, there is almost a certainty that there is going to be waste and extravagance.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is not that the fault of the Committee on Appropriations? It is the duty of the Committee on Appropriations to inquire and ascertain, and they generally do, what the money is to be expended for. I admit that we have to rely to some extent upon the estimates of the departments.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Appropriations Committee took the time and gave detailed attention to the appropriation bills that are coming in now, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] would be rising in his place and taking the Appropriations Committee to task for delaying legislation. What I am saying is not in criticism of anybody, but I am simply trying to indicate a condition which is going to develop here and which Senators will have to notice sooner or later. I am confident that I am right about that proposition.

Now, I want to refer to one other statement made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. He stated that a proposition had been introduced in the British Parliament providing for a similar committee and that it had not met approval. The British Cabinet is made up from members of Parliament. The members of the cabinet in France are members of the French Chamber of Deputies. So the organization of the Governments in those countries differs materially from ours. But it happens that within 30 days there has been a discussion in Parliament on this very question, relating to a proposition introduced by one of its members, and it is so pertinent to our situation and to this discussion that I want to bring a few extracts from it to the attention of the Senate. The member who introduced this proposition was Maj. Godfrey Collins. He gave six reasons why he thought it should be adopted. I want to read one or two of those reasons. He said:

The second reason is that the supreme object of the House of Commons is to control expenditures. But the necessary knowledge is deliberately withheld, and without knowledge control can not be effective. Without publicity facts can not be known, and without discussion the present position can not be remedied. Publicity in these matters is not a danger but a safeguard. Obscurity and lack of knowledge cover up mistakes and enable those mistakes to be repeated. Strategy is common sense applied to war. Unless the cost in men and materials is known, how can success be achieved? Publicity is essential. The Government evidently considers that publicity in some matters is essential.

Note the similarity between the practice of our Government and that in Great Britain—and the increasing use of the press by the Government has diminished the power of this House. The House of Commons is not properly informed about finance. The Government asks for supplies of money and refuses supplies of information. Day by day ministers give information to the press and exchange view for view. They leave the House of Commons out in the cold till they come and ask for money. We are becoming an instrument for registering the decrees of the Government and for providing the necessary supplies. Is this the moment, when the authority of all governments is being questioned, when the spirit of revolution is abroad, to deprive a representative institution of its legitimate functions, so exposing it to the criticism of the people?

Maj. Collins goes on to discuss other reasons for this legislation. He says:

Let me advance another reason to justify this resolution. Last week in this House the vote for the ministry of munitions was being considered. The speech of the minister revealed the manifold activities of that department, but he did not provide us with any information to enable us to judge whether it was efficiently administered or not, and the ensuing debate revealed that the House of Commons had not sufficient knowledge to criticize the working of that department. No one questions the effort of that department, yet few will doubt that the results could have been achieved at a much lower figure. At present this department has a blank check. This House does not know what they are doing. I say the time has arrived when this House should know how the people's money is being spent and that some measure of control should be applied.

This resolution was discussed by various members of Parliament at that time. I have the record here. It was not opposed by onyone who discussed it. After the discussion had closed, the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Bonar Law, made reply, and I wish to read one or two extracts from his reply to indicate how differently such a proposition is received in Great Britain after three years of war from the reception which is given it by our Executive. Mr. Law said:

With these preliminary observations I should like to come direct to the motion before the House. I have no fault whatever to find—indeed, I am in complete agreement, if I may say so—with the speech of my right honorable friend who has just addressed the House.

THE PURPOSES OF THE RESOLUTION.

No one who was chancellor of exchequer could fail to have the feeling, which I know is almost universal, that the scale of expenditure now is something appalling, and that we have the right to be sure that it is not greater than it ought to be. No one can avoid having that feeling, and, in addition, I should be the last man to quarrel with the view expressed by him that the House of Commons ought to have control in matters of this kind.

Then he goes on to make his suggestion and makes the point, which has been made here, and which I approve, that there should be no interference with policy resulting from this legislation, but he said there is every reason for scrutiny of expenditures. Mr. Law said:

I am going to tell the house what I am not only willing to see done, but what I should myself like to see done from a treasury point of view. The committees to which my right honorable friend referred were each of them presided over by a cabinet minister. I have no objection, and I should like to see that kind of examination made by committees of the House of Commons. But it must be clearly understood that reference must be of such a nature as to cut a hard and fast line, if it is possible, in the reference between criticism of policy and an attempt to control expenditure. That is what we desire.

Then he goes on further to refer to the character of the members who might possibly go on this committee. He refers to the fact that there are two ex-chancellors of the exchequer in the House of Commons, and refers to Mr. McKenna as one of them, who, later in the debate, expresses his approval of this activity. Finally, after submitting more definitely what he is willing to accept as representing the Government, Maj. Collins, the proposer of the resolution, said:

I think that the chancellor of the exchequer has made a very fair offer. The only thing I am not clear about is the terms of reference to the committees which are to examine into the expenditure by the Government departments. If the terms of reference are the same as the terms of reference drawn up by the late cabinet for the cabinet committees that sat in 1915 and 1916, they will be quite satisfactory to us. I understand that the other proposition is that the Government propose to set up a committee on the whole subject of additional taxation and of control of expenditure by the House of Commons. The feeling of the house is that we should accept the proposal made by the chancellor of the exchequer and thank the Government for meeting us very fairly this afternoon.

That is, in brief, what has occurred within 30 days in the House of Parliament. Evidently three years' experience has demonstrated to the English Government that it is desirable that there should be supervision over expenditures, not exactly of the audit character which we find in reports made a year after the expenditures have been made, but something that will satisfy public criticism.

Every Senator knows that this Capitol is alive already with one kind of criticism or another, much of which may be without merit. Some of it sounds as if it might have a sound basis. We are expending very rapidly vast amounts of money for the construction that is going on, and unless the public is satisfied that that money is being wisely expended, when we ask for more Red Cross money, when we ask for another issue of bonds, when we say to the country that we are appropriating other billions of dollars, to pay which taxes must be levied, there is going to be a criticism come to Congress which I believe will be so noticeable that it will receive the unanimous approval even of those who are opposed to this action, which is intended entirely to help rather than to embarrass the administration.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. In view of the fact that the Committee on Rules has reported the resolution of the Senator, which he is now discussing, and it is now on the Senate calendar, and in view of the further fact that the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote on a roll call of 365 to nothing passed this bill, does the Senator believe that the Senate would be justified in defeating this bill because it excludes the amendment he has been discussing?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I do not, and I am not advocating that such action should be taken. I would not even have taken the time I have—that is, to explain and answer some of the statements which have been made about this legislation—if those statements had not been made. I have no desire to delay the passage of this food legislation, though I am very doubtful in my own mind about the results that are going to be obtained from it. I am not sure but that it is going to be more harmful than beneficial, and yet the country has been taught that this legislation is going to be a panacea for all their high cost of living difficulties and expects affirmative action. The man who has to administer this bill is going to have the most trying task put up to him that has ever been handed to any man or group of men. In my judgment, he is not going to be able to satisfy any considerable part of our population. The more I study this legislation the less favorably I feel toward it. Yet I have not any desire to delay action on the bill, and would not have done so if it had not been discussed by others in a way that was not warranted.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has just said that he has considerable doubt as to the result that will be obtained through the passage of the bill. I think that nearly every Senator on this floor entertains similar doubts. I confess that I do. In justification of those doubts I should like to follow what appears to have become the senatorial habit of late by referring to an article in a newspaper this morning. This is an article which appears on the first page of the Washington Post, and it has a sort of ex cathedra flavor similar to many others from the same pen that have appeared from time to time lately. In the course of the article this writer says:

The food-control bill is soon to become law, and millions of persons fondly count upon a miracle to be performed by Herbert Hoover. They will be badly disappointed. He will not be able to cut down prices to the individual consumer. At best he will be in charge of only one small part of the system that will have to be created to control prices in this country.

There is far more probability that food prices will go up than that they will go down. Other prices will surely go up until the United States Government intervenes.

President Wilson's appeal to the patriotism of American manufacturers has had no appreciable effect on prices, even to the Government. The United States is paying famine prices for materials that are abundant and which do not return great rewards to labor.

Further down in the same article:

Some of the strong men in the Government have been giving anxious thought to the price problem. They foresee that the food administration will be intensely unpopular as soon as the people discover that prices are not lowered. They see also that the Government must use an iron hand and a war club in hammering down prices of war materials.

Mr. President, this sounds to me like the preparation for an alibi.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know who wrote that article?

Mr. NEW. It is published under the name of Ryley Grannon. Who the gentleman is I do not know. I never have seen him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is not sure that he has not seen him?

Mr. NEW. I gather the Senator's meaning. Perhaps I may have seen him. I do not know the gentleman who writes under that name, but, Mr. President, as the Senator from Oklahoma interjected here, it seems like covering a line of retreat.

Mr. President, much has been said of late of the opposition to this bill by the Senate, the delay that has been worked to the passage of a measure demanded by the President and by the people.

I think, Mr. President, if the truth were known that there are not 10 Members of this body—let us confess it—I do not think there are 10 Members of this body on both sides of the Chamber who actually believe in this bill. I do not think there are that many, or that there have been that many from the time the discussion was first started, who have believed that the bill was going to work out as its sponsors have sought to make the public believe, and with great success. This article in this morning's paper gives evidence to my mind that those who are behind the bill are rather coming to the conclusion that it is not going to accomplish what was promised for it. Yet, Mr. President, while I think I have stated the facts when I say that a vast majority of this body do not believe that the bill will accomplish what its proponents have claimed, it is very apparent that the bill is going to pass. The Senate is going to give this measure to the administration because the administration wants it, because the administration has insisted upon it, and not because the Senate believes in it.

The public, as was so well said the other day by the present occupant of the chair [the President pro tempore in the chair], has been led to expect favorable results from the passage of this bill; that food prices, the cost of living, will be materially reduced to the people as the result of its passage. The public has been led to that expectancy to the degree that it would be impolitic, perhaps, to defeat the bill at this time. The newspapers of the country have fostered that impression until the whole public is expecting the impossible, in my judgment, as the result of this measure. Still, as I said before, it is very evident that the Senate is going to give the people and the administration this bill, not in accordance with the judgment of the Senate, but because the administration wants it and demands it, and because of the popular demand, which, in my judgment, is based upon an expectation that will never be realized.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEW. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator if he believes that the public has any idea of what is in the bill—what the provisions of the bill are?

Mr. NEW. I do not think the public really does understand all this bill includes. They think it something that it is not. But the Senate, so far from denying the administration, is going to give it this, as it has every other measure for which it has expressed a desire since this session of Congress assembled.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if that is the condition of the senatorial mind, then it certainly will be creditable to vote against the bill. I believe, however, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is right. I do not believe the public is informed about this bill. They have read in newspapers, they have read in official bulletins, they have read in proclamations by some public officer concerning its contents, but as to what is really in the bill they have not the slightest idea.

The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] said here some weeks ago that there were provisions in the bill that would send a farmer to the penitentiary or jail if he did not farm his land in a certain way or if he refrained from cultivating it in grain and put it in pasture and sat down and let live stock graze upon it, or disobeyed the orders of some Government employee. That statement was treated in certain newspapers with incredulity, and yet it is literally true. In this bill there is a provision under which it would not require even a literal interpretation to send any farmer or stock raiser to the penitentiary if he refrained from doing or not doing a certain thing ordered by the Agricultural Department or by any agent of the Government. It is the spirit of the bill. It was no exaggeration of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania when he made the statement. It was but a plain application of the language of the bill, and the application of the principles contained in and intended to be expressed by that language. If the public understood that, especially the producing public, it probably would manifest more interest than it now does.

I have long since ceased to be influenced by the activities of sympathetic coteries, a little collection of people who congratulate each other on possessing all the wisdom there is in the world, and from constant repetition in each other's presence soon they begin to believe it. They are like the chronic village falsifier who tells the original falsehood. He relates it two or three times; he hears it repeated by the gossips a dozen times; it is circulated in the neighborhood; it comes back in echoes and reechoes until finally he believes it is true, and with him it is no longer a question of falsehood, but it is repeating what he has heard. That same process repeats itself here when it comes to ascertaining public opinion.

A coterie of gentlemen who are connected with the Government in various official capacities, and some of them semi-officially, began to cultivate public sentiment; they repeat many times certain arguments and statements as to the necessity and the substance of the bill. After a while the public accepts those as a correct statement of its contents. There is no use for Senators to deny it; there is no use for Senators to say anything except to accept without question the directions of the Executive and the statement that they are an incompetent body and are mere obstacles to human progress and ought to resign or die. Nobody ever heard of a Federal official doing either, and so the statement is a mere superfluity of speech.

The news article which was read by the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is very much in point, but I was greatly impressed with the statement that, in his opinion, it was a preparation for an alibi. I am quite familiar with those processes; they are not peculiar to Washington. Just as soon as unreasonable expectations are aroused and impossible things are expected of remedial legislation, when they face performance, the responsible authors of the misinformation quite often begin to feel that responsibility. Then they begin the preparation of just such alibis as that indicated in this article. It is not the first time, in connection with legislation here within the last 12 months, that the same thing has happened. The public is destined to great disappointment not only as to this but as to some other measures; and so they are beginning now to say that things that are impossible to be performed can not be performed by legislation any more than in other undertakings of human life. The symptoms are the same as in other failures.

Let me call attention to some things in this bill. I shall not vote for the conference committee report, needless to say, because it possesses much less practical merit when it is worked out than the bill passed by the Senate or the bill as it originally passed the other House. As the bill passed the Senate it contained some workable provisions. As it has come back finally, even as it now stands, I think it is worse than the bill which passed either House.

It is not my desire to take time, for I realize, as do other Senators, that the bill will pass this body on a roll call. It is immaterial whether some of us vote for it or whether we are absent; there will be a quorum and there will be a majority vote for the adoption of the conference report.

However, section 1 of the bill contains a provision for the control of "fertilizer, fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment" of various kinds used directly in the production of food. Omitting all except that applying to agricultural implements, I wish for the present to call attention to the condition. Steel is left out of the bill; iron and all of its products are left out; aluminum is left out; rubber is left out; copper is left out; cotton is left out; and there remain in the bill foodstuffs, fuels, and the like that affect the farmer, together with agricultural implements and fertilizer materials.

England formerly manufactured not only her own agricultural implements, but enough to satisfy the demands of her colonies—Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the far outlying points of the British Empire. That is no longer true, Mr. President. England's agricultural implement factories have been turned into munition factories. To-day she has not enough to supply her own wants in the island of England. England to-day is using every square foot of territory which can produce foodstuffs of any kind. She has plowed up her game preserves, her golf courses, and much other land which in ordinary times would not be used for productive purposes is now being used to full capacity.

Here is a single order that came to an agricultural implement house in my State. I will not give the name of the house, but I know its manager, its officers, and where its home office is located. It lies almost within the shadow of my old district of Rock Island. There came from England recently, within the last two weeks, orders for 8,000 walking plows, 7,000 binders, 3,000 grain drills, 5,000 tractor plows, 3,000 disk harrows, 5,000 drag or tooth harrows. England is unable to supply her own wants. I inquired for what purpose these agricultural implements were desired and whether they were wanted for export to her colonies? I was informed they were for use in England. She can not make enough plows, binders, and ordinary agricultural implements to supply the needs of Englishmen in the island of England. South America, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada depend on us for agricultural implements.

This order could not be accepted by an agricultural implement factory in my State. They are unable to accept any orders of that kind under present conditions, and under this bill it will be more impossible than ever. Under this bill no iron or steel products, no rubber, no aluminum, no copper are controlled. Agricultural implements are. Of what are they made? Almost entirely of iron and steel in their various forms. So the article which the manufacturer of agricultural implements makes is controlled by Government-fixed prices, but the material from which he makes the implement is not controlled in any manner. He must buy in an unrestricted market all the materials from which he makes agricultural implements and must sell in a Government price-fixed market the agricultural implement which is his finished product. We will be wanting when the world turns to us for such implements.

I called attention, Mr. President, some weeks ago on this floor to the fact that the Council of National Defense through its advisory committee having to do with that matter at first prohibited to all the agricultural implement manufacturers more than 50 per cent of the sheet steel requirements of their respective houses. That was afterwards, on complaint, modified so as to make it a restriction of only 25 per cent. So the manufacturers can have 75 per cent of their reasonable manufacturing requirements, but no more. The 25 per cent limitation still applies. It applies to every factory making the articles that might have been supplied on this order.

Over 100,000 corn planters will be needed before next year's corn crop is put into the ground. One hundred and fifty thousand binders will be required before next year's grain crop is cut. In the area from which comes the greater part of all the corn planters and binders in the world the manufacturers begin to manufacture corn planters in October and binders in November and December. They can not fully manufacture under present conditions, because there is a 25 per cent limitation upon their requirements of an essential material. They can not take a single order from abroad, and they do not know whether they can secure the material to make enough even for the limited requirements of our own country. They can not fill a single order of the offer to which I have referred, because in this bill there is a provisions fixing the price at which agricultural implements may be sold. If the Government can fix the price of those implements for the domestic trade, the price can be fixed for the foreign trade as well. That is the condition under which the manufacturers find themselves laboring. It is an obstacle to our own people and to our allies around the world.

Now, I wish to call attention to another matter. I promise the Senate that I shall be very brief—a matter of minutes, not of hours at all. It is not a question of talking hours. I decline to do that on a bill of this character, because demonstration can only be made by actual experiment. We might talk for many weary weeks and accomplish nothing. I realize that. It is for the public to have demonstrated to them by the actual operation of this law beyond peradventure what the result of it will be.

Not long ago, early in June, coal operators came to Washington, and although the agreement they entered into with the Government was repudiated by some departments, no hindrance has been placed on the execution of the agreement made by the operators by any other department, the Department of Justice, or otherwise. After conference with the Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane, they announced their list of coal prices. In a circular which I have, dated July 2, 1917, following their conference, the price is fixed for run-of-the-mine coal, bituminous coal, in Illinois, at $2.75, and for screened coal, the domestic sizes, at $3.50. This list of prices is headed with the following statement:

To Illinois operators:

Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane, Gov. J. F. Fort, of the Federal Trade Commission, and the coal production committee of the National Defense Council, in a conference in Washington, D. C., June 26 to June 28, inclusive, having heard the statements of the coal operators of the country regarding production costs and the conditions now surrounding that industry, recommended the following maximum prices for Illinois, to which the special committee of seven Illinois operators assented.

Then follows the figures I have given.

There are a few exceptions in certain mining districts. For instance, Thin Vein North Field is excepted because of high-production cost, and a 50-cent higher maximum price is allowed. The Assumption Coal Mining Co. and Jackson County No. 2 seam are also excepted.

The other parts of the paper I shall not read. It concludes:

The maximum commission allowed jobbers, 25 cents per ton.

Immediately following the conference this circular was issued and right on the heels of that, in fact preceding it, prices went up. I have some original bills of lading in my possession. I shall not give the name of the coal company out of deference to its rights, for I do not wish to discriminate against it or against any others in that section, but these are original bills of lading made out by the coal company to a local coal merchant in one of the towns of Illinois. The bill of lading which I read is dated the 5th day of May, 1916. It is for lump coal f. o. b. the cars at the siding at the mines. Lump coal is screened coal. It is run through the screen, and the smaller sizes are sifted out. This quality of coal on the date indicated was $1.45 a ton in carload lots. On July 20, 1916, the same coal was $1.60 a ton. On June 8, 1917, the same coal of the same company, at the same place, and under the same terms, f. o. b. cars at the mine, was $2.50 a ton. On the 13th day of June, 1917, the same coal was $3.75 a ton, and all of this time governmental activities were in operation seeking to reduce the price of coal.

Hard on the heels of the conference held from the 26th to the 28th days of June, 1917, between the coal operators, the Secretary of the Interior, and the advisory committee of the Council of National Defense having to do with this matter, there was issued by the State Council of Defense a circular, dated July 24, 1917. It is signed by B. F. Harris, John H. Harrison, Victor A. Olander, Levy Mayer, David E. Shanahan, Charles H. Wacker, John H. Walker, Samuel Insell, and John P. Hopkins. B. F. Harris is a banker in Champaign, Ill. John H. Harrison is a newspaper man of Danville, Ill. Victor Olander is secretary of the Chicago Federation of Labor, Chicago, Ill. Levy Mayer is a lawyer in Chicago, Ill. David E. Shanahan is the speaker of the Illinois House of Representatives at the present time, resident in Chicago. Charles H. Wacker is a brewer in Chicago. John H. Walker is president of the State Federation of Labor in Illinois. Samuel Insull is the president of the Commonwealth-Edison Electric Co. John P. Hopkins is a capitalist and business man and formerly mayor of Chicago. These are thoroughly typical men in their different lines of effort in that State. They contribute this matter, which is of interest at this time in connection with efforts to reduce prices:

THE STATE COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
STATE CAPITOL, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.,
Chicago, Ill., July 24, 1917.

To the State Council of Defense of Illinois:

The special committee of the State Council of Defense has been in session with the coal operators or their committee and a committee of the three State officers of the Illinois Miners Union for three entire days, with a view to securing by voluntary arrangement a reduction in the current prices of coal, if, upon investigation, that price was found to be too high. The coal operators by their committee have positively refused to make any reduction and have put their final declination upon three grounds:

(a) That the price now being charged was based upon a schedule fixed after consultation in Washington with some Government officials.

(b) That the price should not be lowered except by Federal action, because the reduction in the price in Illinois without a similar reduction in adjacent coal-producing States might lead to discriminatory conditions; and the miners' committee contended

(c) That an announced demand on the part of the miners for an increase in the wage scale of 25 cents per ton for the digger and an increase from $3.60 to $5 per day for the day man after the expiration of the existing wage contract, which expires in March, 1918, renders it impossible to attempt to make changes at this time in the price of coal. In other words, the miners' union committee concurred with the refusal of the operators to lower the price of coal at this time.

The council committee has given careful consideration to the positions advanced by the coal operators and the miners. It has kept in mind the momentous duties that devolve upon the council as an important official branch of the government of this State—a branch created for the very purpose of discharging functions of the kind involved in the present inquiry.

The council committee, after earnest study and with the realization of the gravity of its work, has come to the following conclusions:

(a) It is true that certain officials in Washington last month agreed upon a charge by the coal operators of a tentative maximum of $2.75 a ton at the mine pit for mine-run and a tentative maximum of $3.50 per ton for screened lump and higher grades of coal. We emphasize the fact that this arrangement permitted of a tentative maximum charge, but did not deny the operators the right, nor interfere with their duty, to charge less if the operators concluded so to do. Nor should the fact be lost sight of that the arrangement referred to was almost immediately repudiated by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

There is no force in the contention that because this repudiated arrangement permitted a tentative maximum price, therefore, a lower price should not now be charged. Furthermore, the evidence submitted to us disclosed the fact that many Illinois operators are in fact charging certain customers prices which are considerably less than these tentative prices. The position of the operators is untenable.

(b) The contention that to lower the price in Illinois would invite discrimination or competition with the coal operators of adjacent States is not pertinent, because the council committee informed the coal operators that it was the plan of the committee to arrive at a basis with the Illinois operators and with the operators in adjacent States.

Federal action has been and may be so long delayed as to be totally ineffective. If no other way remains the control of prices in Illinois alone will be urged and enforced, if possible.

(c) The contention of the miners that because of a substantial advance which they announce, they will ask in March, 1918, therefore no change should be made in the current price does not meet the present situation. The prevailing wage scale in force with the coal miners does not expire until March 31, 1918.

The council committee wishes to arrange a price which will meet present emergencies and necessities. It was shown and conceded by the operators at the hearing that every coal contract, with few, if any, exceptions made during the last 12 months contained an express provision that such contracts were based upon the present miners' wage scales and railroad rates and delivery wage scales, and that if these rates were increased the coal prices fixed in the contracts would be changed accordingly.

The council committee is of the opinion and announces as its conclusions the following:

1. The price of coal is excessively high. It includes a profit per ton much in excess of a fair and reasonable profit. The largest coal operator in Illinois whose mines produce nearly 20 per cent of the entire output of the State frankly and publicly stated at the first meeting of the council committee held with the operators on the 21st instant, that the price now being charged by the operators in indefensible. The evidence produced by the operators showed that in July, 1916, coal in great quantities was being offered by the operators in this State at $1.25 and $1.35 per ton at the mines for the highest grade, and that for the same grade of coal the operators are now charging from $3 to $3.50 a ton, and prior to July 1, 1917, charged still higher prices.

2. The only increase in the coal miners' wage scale since July 1, 1916, to date has not exceeded 20 cents a ton. This increase can not account for a jump of $2.15 per ton in the price of coal at the mine between July, 1916, and July, 1917.

3. The council committee is aware of the drastic powers possessed by it under the law—powers conferred to meet war exigencies. The committee realizes the dire results that may come to the people and industries of this State if an equitable coal-price basis be not speedily arrived at, a basis which must be equally fair and just to both the operators and the consumer.

By a supplemental report which the committee will make to the State council at its meeting to be held next Tuesday, the 31st instant, there will be submitted for consideration a vigorous course of action deemed by the committee appropriate in the premises.

Respectfully,

B. F. HARRIS,
JOHN H. HARRISON,
VICTOR A. OLANDER,
LEVY MAYER,
DAVID E. SHANAHAN,
CHARLES H. WACKER,
JOHN H. WALKER,
SAMUEL INSULL (Chairman),
JOHN P. HOPKINS (Secretary),
Special Committee.

CHICAGO, July 31, 1917.

At a meeting of the State Council of Defense held this day, the foregoing report of the special committee was unanimously approved and ordered published.

SAMUEL INSULL, Chairman.
JOHN P. HOPKINS, Secretary.

I read this in order to illuminate the present condition of coal prices. I wish to show, too, what I have stated very briefly, that at no place along the line has the Government undertaken anything in the way of a performance of a service or the sale of a commodity or regulating it that its prices have not increased. That is the universal experience of everything from the time the Government has begun to intermeddle.

Let me call attention to the cantonment being built at Rockford, Ill. Five thousand men are at work there every day. Unskilled laborers, that can only shovel cinders and earth into a wheelbarrow and dump it, are receiving $3.75 a day for a 10-hour day. They are really paid at the rate of $4.12½, because they get 11 nours' pay for 10 hours' work. The commonest kind of carpenter that can saw a board or run a jack-plane or drive a nail gets $6 a day. Plumbers are receiving $8.25 a day. Every species of workman is receiving the highest prices in the history of Rockford or of the State. Lumber has shot up to a prodigious price. The Government is paying it. Nails by the keg or by the carload lot are sold at prices never heard of before in the hardware trade. Wherever the Government touches the market, either to employ a workman or to purchase merchandise for construction operations of this kind, uniformly it costs the Government more than it does anybody else. I shall not complain of it, I am only stating the fact.

The Government proposes, under this revolving fund, to take charge of a large quantity of surplus breadstuffs and foods after the Government has provided for the wants of the Army and the Navy. If the Government can take breadstuffs and sell them for less than private employers or private enterprises can sell them, they will beat any record they have ever made since I have known governmental operations, either State or national. When they get through encouraging wheat production, which is supposed to be the basis of foodstuff prices, what condition are we facing?

I had from Peoria on day before yesterday the prices quoted on corn—$2.42 for corn in Peoria. In Chicago last Thursday corn sold on exchange for $2.38 a bushel. Corn is now selling, wherever any sales are made, for December delivery, for the crop that is still growing out of the ground, at $1.25. It is the highest price ever known for December corn in the United States. Now, tell me, in the face of $2.38 for spot corn and $1.25 for corn next December, how many farmers in the wheat belt where corn can be raised will plant or reserve for planting this fall a solitary acre for wheat?

If a farmer can get $1.25 for December corn and, if he wants to crib it and hold it, with the prospect of getting $2.40 next summer for old corn, he is not exercising ordinary prudence if he does not save his farm land and put it in corn next spring and raise what he can. It will beat any wheat crop that can be raised. Corn can produce from 60 to 70 bushels per acre with ordinarily skillful husbandry, and at those prices it is needless to talk to the farmer about raising wheat.

So, as I see it, under this bill, with a minimum price fixed, with its limitations upon what the farmer's surplus shall be sold at in a restricted market, with an attempt to hold down the agricultural-implement manufacturers by fixing the price of their product by the Government, while leaving all the raw material that the manufacturer must use for agricultural implements to be bought on an unrestricted market, when we get through, the last condition of the American people will be infinitely worse than the first.

Therefore, if I am present in my place when the roll call comes, I shall vote against this conference committee report with more of a feeling that I am right in it than I did when I voted on the bill on the roll call against its passage in the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, after listening to the lecture of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], of whom I am especially fond, and with whom I have served not only in this body, but in the other body, I realize that it is best to proceed with caution. I feel, however, that I would not be true to myself nor to my people should I fail to discuss some of the provisions of this bill.

I think it is extremely unwise for us to get excited during these times. I think it is best, not only for Congress but for the country, that we proceed with calmness and discretion. I know that when I undertake to discuss a question, or even to discuss matters with individuals, and allow myself to be carried away and not use my best judgment, it has an injurious effect upon me as well as it will have, of course, upon those with whom I associate. I have tried during these strenuous times to exercise calm and judgment, and I want to be frank; only upon one occasion has my enthusiasm gotten away with my judgment. I regret that it happened, but shall hope to profit by my experience in the future.

Mr. President, I voted for this bill when it passed the Senate, though not with the idea that it will do what the friends of the measure claim for it, because I am reasonably sure that it will not help either to reduce the cost of living or to stimulate production.

I want to digress for a moment and say that after listening to the discussion on yesterday I was somewhat disappointed, but I believe that the discussion that was going on was perhaps not as deliberate as the men who carried it on would wish it to be. I want to say for the members of the Agricultural Committee, excepting none, that I believe they have done their very best in order to make a bill that will be to the best interests of the American people. I do not know that any member of the Agricultural Committee has made any attempt to hold up this bill or to delay action upon it.

I know that the Senator in charge of the bill has been most industrious, and I will say for myself that he has shown a friendly spirit to all his associates. I certainly have no complaint to make of him, and I believe that the other members of the committee have likewise been industrious and faithful in carrying out their obligations to the country.

I thought it was rather an imposition when the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], asked the committee to come to the Capitol on Sunday. We were here in this Capitol on a holiday, and those who are in the habit of going to the house of worship, instead of being there, were deliberating in one of the committee rooms in this building.

I do not charge that the Senator from Oklahoma, the distinguished chairman of the committee, did this with any intention of wrong, but I simply mention it to show how anxious the Senator from Oklahoma has been not to delay action but to have the bill passed or disposed of as speedily as possible.

As a member of the Agricultural Committee I know that we took but one day to discuss this bill in the committee. A subcommittee was called together. We finished our deliberations that very same day, and on the next morning the entire committee was called together, and the bill, I believe, was reported to the Senate that very same day. So it can not be said that there has been any undue delay in considering this bill. There is no doubt but that it took some time for the conferees to agree upon the bill. I think the Members of the House on the conference were more successful in getting the provisions which the House had originally inserted in the bill than were the conferees on the part of the Senate. I do not say that the Senate conferees did not do the best they could, but I will say that the bill will show for itself that without a correction in punctuation or phraseology the Senate conferees yielded practically everything that the House conferees demanded. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. President, I feel that I have the right to criticize not the committee of conference but the provisions of this bill. I am fearful that instead of being the means of stimulating production this very bill will be the cause of discouraging production. That is not what the President of the United States wants. That is not what the President of the United States said to me and other members of the committee when he called us to the White House a month or two ago.

I have on one or two occasions called attention to the fact that I believe the President of the United States is intensely interested in this bill, or I want to say interested in having a food bill passed that will, first, stimulate production; secondly, be the means of giving the Americans food at prices that will not be extravagant. This bill can not and will not do that if it is carried out according to its letter.

Section 1 of the bill as it was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and later on further amended by the Senate on the floor included not only agricultural products but steel, iron and their products, minerals of all kinds and their products, and when I say minerals I speak of oil and gas. There are no such provisions in the bill now. It also included hemp and jute and their products. I shall not take the time of the Senate to go into that as fully as perhaps I should, because I have on one or two former occasions called attention to the importance of binder twine to the farmer. I told the Senate not long ago that the increased cost in twine alone to the American farmer this year is more than $35,000,000. Yet you have not given that any consideration. It is taken out of the bill. The monopoly which controls binder twine is a foreign monopoly; it is a Yucatan monopoly. Not more than two years ago sisal hemp was bought by the American manufacturers in New York for less than 5 cents a pound. To-day the price is about 20 cents per pound. Do you expect the American manufacturer to be able to sell binder twine cheap to the American farmer when the raw product costs him 20 cents a pound?

Mr. President, I hold no brief for the manufacturers of this country, but I want to tell the truth, so far as I know it to be the truth. I had the privilege of serving on a committee where we held meetings for 30 days, and those hearings disclosed that the twine manufacturers of this country sold twine to the dealers, to the jobbers, at a very small profit. When I was appointed on that committee I at first refused to accept the appointment, because I said to the chairman that I was really prejudiced against the American twine manufacturers. I had not investigated the situation, and I believed that the tremendous high price was due to the excessive profit charged by the American manufacturers. I think the report of that committee will show that such was not the case.

Mr. President, you want the farmer to sell his products to the American consumer cheap. I find no fault with that, providing you will give the farmer an opportunity to buy what is necessary in order to produce crops enabling him to sell his product at a low price. But you have not done that.

I congratulate poor old Rockefeller, or I should rather say the Standard Oil Co., because I consider it a victory for them. I consider it a victory for the grain exchanges of the country, the way this bill has been reported back to the Senate. Instead of including petroleum and its products—gasoline and kerosene, the products that are used in large quantities by the farmers of the country, especially in the West—you have made it impossible for a farmer to get a single gallon of this product at a controlled price, whether that price be high or low. It is true the conference committee has seen fit to include the words "fuel oils," but you are not deceiving the American people. You will not deceive them by putting in the words "fuel oils."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall yield in a moment. I believed I understood that phraseology, but in order to be absolutely sure I have consulted men who know. Fuel oil is the product of the refuse from petroleum after 15 per cent of gasoline has been extracted from it. Perhaps in some instances there may be some crude oil low in quality for its use; but I say you can not fool the American farmers by making them believe that you have given them kerosene and gasoline under a controlled price, because the bill does not do it, and I challenge a successful contradiction of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, does the Senator believe there are any such persons in the United States as independent oil producers as contradistinguished from the Rockefeller interests, the Standard Oil interests?

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, Mr. President, that is an old story. This is not the first time I have been up against that proposition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am just asking the Senator a question. If they are allied interests, then the committee was misled; but I want to say to the Senator that the conference committee permitted the independent oil refiners to appear before them in conference, and I think they made an exception only in that case. They were vouched for by members of the committee who knew who they were and whom they represented; and it was shown, I think, conclusively that if we had included kerosene and gasoline and oil in the bill as it was written here it would have been directly in the interest of the Standard Oil Co. The committee agreed upon it so that the independent oil men might have some advantage under the terms of the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, to go into that intelligently would require far more time, I will say to the Senator, than I intend to take in the discussion of this bill. I know something about these independent companies; not all, but I know something about them. I know something about the history of them. It is a good deal the same with these independents and with the Standard Oil Co. that it is with the milling concerns of the country. When they want legislation they are never here to represent themselves; they are here in the interest of the farmer or the producer. I have for many years listened to the siren songs of these plutocrats. Never in the history of my legislative service have I heard them say they were here in the interest of themselves, but always in the interest of the farmer.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator once more?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In order that the Senator may know whether the party who appeared before the conference committee was a reputable man or not, it was Mr. Walsh, who was vouched for by the distinguished Senator from Iowa. He was represented as a man who had fought the Standard Oil Co. for a great many years and a man who had gone before the Trade Commission and made the fight for the independent oil producers of the country, and had done it very ably and with learning upon the whole subject.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not doubt that there are men in this country calling themselves independents who are interested in the oil business. I know some of them. They are reputable men, as the Senator has said. Naturally they want to protect their interests. It is just as natural for them to protect their interests as it is for the Standard Oil to protect theirs. But suppose the agent of the Standard Oil comes here and asks for a favor; perhaps we would not be so ready to grant the request as we may be to grant the request of these so-called independents.

Mr. President, as I understand it the Senator who has this bill in charge has admitted that the phraseology used in this bill does not include kerosene and gasoline. The poor washerwoman who buys her gasoline for her gasoline stove or kerosene for her kerosene stove will have to depend upon the charity of the great monopoly, the Standard Oil. The farmer who runs his little tractor instead of having the right to go to the food controller or to the President of the United States and complain as to the price, the controlled price, as it would be if we had left the language in the bill as the Senate committee wrote it, will not have an opportunity to come to Washington and complain that the price that he is paying for gasoline or for kerosene for his little tractor is unduly high. That has been left, I say, to the discretion and charity of Standard Oil.

But I suppose it is treason to call attention to that. I suppose it is disloyal to take sufficient time of the Senate to call attention to some of these provisions, and which I challenge any man to deny.

Mr. President, I make no secret of the fact that I was opposed to the war. I do not deny that I was opposed to the selective draft until the American people had been given an opportunity to show their patriotism by volunteering. But never have I delayed legislation since these measures were passed. No bill has been delayed by me in the Senate for more than 10 minutes since the declaration of war. No man on this floor has ever been more anxious to vote for appropriations necessary to carry it on. My son is in this war, Senators. He did not have to go, because he was not of age. A few of the men suggested by my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] are not the cowards that some people want the country to believe they are. The same Senator has taken hours where I have taken minutes in the discussion of these measures. I followed him in the House when a member of his committee, and I was not perhaps as loyal a partisan as I should have been. I followed the distinguished Senator from Mississippi on measures when I served in the House as often as I followed the leaders on the Republican side. So he must not attribute to me or charge me with trying to carry out partisan politics on this floor, because he knows it is not true.

Real men do not care for criticism, let me tell you. They thrive on opposition and criticism. Men whose hearts are filled with patriotism and love of country do not fear criticism. I shall answer to my people. I am responsible to them for my action in this body and outside of this body.

But, Mr. President, it comes with mighty poor grace from men who lecture here certain Members of this body every time they see an inspired article in a newspaper. I do not know that I care about it. It does not hurt my feelings so very much, because, as I said, I have tried to remain calm on these matters, especially during these trying times when we are at war with this powerful enemy of Europe. I have tried, I say, to remain calm and to use my judgment instead of acting upon impulse.

Mr. President, when this bill came before the committee many of the articles which necessarily are used by the farmers were included in the bill. Several more were included on this floor. I read from line 9 of the bill, page 1, the articles included—including petroleum and its products, aluminum and its products, hides, skins, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, cotton, wool, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, or the joint product or products of two or more of the said materials, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers, and fertilizer ingredients—

And so forth.

Now, that would have given the farmer an opportunity to buy his machinery, his tools, things that are necessary to carry on agriculture, in a controlled market, in a restricted market. As it is now, he buys all his implements, he buys everything he consumes, in an unrestricted market, and he sells in a restricted market.

I have marked several of these provisions in the bill. I had an idea at one time to go into it and analyze it as best I could. It will probably require more time than I am warranted in taking this afternoon, and so I shall call attention to only what I deem the most important provisions.

While section 4 of the bill has not been materially changed by the committee, it will, in my judgment, do an injustice not only to those who are engaged in agriculture, but it will do an injustice to labor. The junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was successful in having incorporated into the bill a provision exempting organized labor from the operation of section 4. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and myself have called attention to the fact that if a farmer limits production he need not disobey the order of the food director, as stated by the Senator from Illinois; but if he refuses or if he fails to produce as much in the future as he has in the past, he is subject to a fine and to imprisonment under section 4. If a few men belonging to organized labor should in any way interfere with transportation or with the transportation facilities, they are in like manner subject to be penalized by a fine of $10,000 and two years in the penitentiary, or both. But the Senator from New Hampshire discussed that most ably yesterday afternoon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the Senator kindly put his finger on the part of section 4 which would authorize the imprisonment of a farmer who simply limited his production?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir; I shall be glad to do that. Does the Senator want me to read the whole section or just a part of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just that part of it.

Mr. GRONNA. It comes under subsection (d) "willfully to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production"——

Mr. GRONNA. "Or the production of any necessaries." Does not the Senator think that will apply if in my usual operations I am farming 100 acres and I reduce it next year to 50 acres? Is not that reducing, is it not limiting, production?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator did not read it quite all. If he will read the context he will find that his statement there is not correct. It is to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person (a), that is, to do certain things, (b) to do certain other things, (c) to do certain things, and (d) "to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries." What for? "In order to enhance the price." It is a conspiracy to do those things for the purpose of enhancing the price.

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly that question answers itself. If you limit the production you enhance the price. You augment the price every time you limit the production. There is no question about that.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] calls my attention to what is a fact—that the word "willfully" has been stricken out by the conferees.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it must be a conspiracy, a combination and agreement and arrangement with any other person to do these things.

Mr. GRONNA. Now, supposing that in a locality, not a very large one, the acreage is reduced, does not the Senator think that it can be held that there was a conspiracy to limit production in order to enhance the price?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No.

Mr. GRONNA. I fear that when the producers read this bill and analyze it they will understand that the bill is not being enacted into a law for the purpose of aiding them in order that they may be able to produce more, but that it is enacted for other purposes.

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that organized labor, like the farmer, is affected by the provisions of this section; that if they undertake to disturb, or if they in any manner disturb the facilities of transportation, they are guilty of a violation of this section and can be punished; they can be imprisoned for two years and fined $10,000, or both.

I now come to the section which I think is one of the most important sections in the entire bill; that is section 6, which is known as the hoarding section. Section 6 provides:

SEC. 6. That any person who willfully hoards any necessaries shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. Necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirement for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time; (b) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (c) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price.

Mr. President, that language is very plain, and I should find no fault with it if the provision had been left as it passed this Chamber. It defines in plain language what hoarding is and who shall be punished for the violation of the law; but the committee of conference has seen fit to insert entirely new matter. Although a similar provision was offered on the floor, the Senator in charge of the measure withdrew it. This provision, Mr. President, in my judgment, exempts from its operation any grain exchange, because it says so in explicit terms. I want to read the proviso which has been inserted by the committee of conference. This proviso, I desire to say, was not in the House bill, nor was it in the Senate bill. The proviso reads:

Provided, That this section shall not include or relate to transactions on any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as described in section 13 of this act that may be permitted by the President under the authority conferred upon him by said section 13.

Then there is another provision which on the face of it exempts any farmer or gardener, but the farmer and gardener are not exempt because the same proviso appears in section 4 of the bill. So, I repeat, the farmer and gardener are not exempt. The farmer is not exempt from hoarding his own crop, because the provision of section 4 would make the farmer liable to fine and imprisonment just as much as if this proviso were left out.

What is this new matter which has been inserted by the committee of conference? It provides in unmistakable terms that any transaction on any grain exchange shall not be deemed a violation of the hoarding section.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there for just a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me undertake to state to the Senator and to the Senate why that language was inserted at that point.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I withdrew this proposed amendment at the time the bill was before the Senate because I seemed to be unable to explain just what the purpose of it was as it was explained to a number of us by Judge Lindsay. The Senator from North Dakota himself has stated on the floor of the Senate that all of the grain exchanges were not evil; in other words, that some of them were necessary in order to fix the price of wheat. Now, if the Senator will refer to section 13 of the bill he will find this language:

That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices—

he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices.

Now, the Senator will note that the President can go over the whole field of these grain exchanges, and whenever he finds that some of them are engaged in the work for the purpose of unlawfully enhancing prices he can adopt rules and regulations and put them out of business. It was not the purpose of the framers of this bill to put out of business a grain exchange which was doing a perfectly legitimate business and doing it in a legitimate way.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Oregon is now referring to section 13?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am referring to section 13, to which the proviso of which the Senator speaks was attached. Therefore, the President can look over the whole field and when he finds these exchanges are violating the regulations which he has established for their government he can stop them from doing business. However, the conference committee, when they had this bill under consideration, thought that as section 6 was written it would put the grain exchanges immediately out of business. It was not the purpose of the conferees, and I do not think it was the purpose of Congress, to put all the exchanges out of business. In order to save those that were permitted to do business under the rules and regulations adopted by the President, this proviso was added to section 6:

Provided, That this section shall not include or relate to transactions on any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as described in section 13 of this act that may be permitted by the President under the authority conferred upon him by said section 13.

In other words, if the President has not denounced in his regulations certain grain exchanges, they are permitted to go on; and the purpose of the proviso was to save those excepted cases under the provisions of section 6.

Now, just one moment, at the risk of taking too much of the Senator's time.

Mr. GRONNA. That is all right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say that this amendment—and the Senator intended at one time to make a point of order against it—the Nelson amendment, so-called, covered exactly what section 6 and section 13 are intended to cover. The Senate adopted that as an amendment to this bill. So the proviso to which the Senator calls attention was simply to apply to those grain exchanges which were not denounced by the regulations adopted by the President. That is all.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, Mr. President, I am sorry that I shall have to differ from the Senator from Oregon. Section 6 is, as the Senator knows, the hoarding section. It has no reference whatever to section 13. Section 13 is the price-fixing section, and that was the section to which the amendment of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] applied. It applied to the transactions on the board of trade. Section 6, the hoarding section, I will say to the Senator in all frankness, has nothing whatever to do with exchanges. Will the Senator from Oregon deny that it is possible and permissible under section 6, as it has been amended, for a person, firm, or corporation to hoard by transactions through chambers of commerce or boards of trade?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not if they have not permission to do it.

Mr. GRONNA. They have the permission. Now, let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose there is a little flouring mill in North Dakota—and we have a few left, though the most of them have ceased operations. The Senator from Oregon is supporting a proposition, although I know he does not do it intentionally, that will operate exactly, at least in my judgment, according to the statement that I am about to make. Suppose that a flouring mill in my State sells 10,000 barrels of flour; it can not go out to the farmers and contract for that amount of grain in that locality, but it can hedge on the board of trade, or it can buy its supply of grain on any grain exchange. Will the Senator assure me that the food commissioner will not consider that 50,000 bushels is an excessive quantity, but that the little flouring mill in North Dakota could be permitted under this proposed law to transact business in that way? It simply enables those who can operate on a large scale, the big millers, for instance, the men whom we have tried to curb for, lo, these many years, to hoard legally.

I think I know who submitted that amendment. I know who is more interested in the amendment, perhaps, than are Senators on this floor. Personally he is a good citizen, but he belongs to a firm which has been the largest grain-exporting firm in the city of Duluth, and with all due respect to Mr. Lindsay, the lawyer, he may have had the information, but Mr. Barnes, I believe, was the author of the amendment.

By this very act, I say to the Senator from Oregon, hoarding is legalized if the transactions are made through a grain exchange, but hoarding is penalized if the transactions are made through a small dealer. The provision applies not only to grain, but it applies to other products as well.

Suppose a canner sells for future delivery what would be imagined, perhaps, by the food director to be an unduly large quantity of canned goods? Such action is penalized by this section. Such transactions are not as a rule made on exchanges or on boards of trade. As every Senator here must know, all the small millers throughout the country would be seriously affected by this provision. Suppose there is enough grain in the State of New York, the home of the distinguished Senator [Mr. WADSWORTH], to supply the demand in that locality and that the miller buys it. Will any Senator contend that this provision here will not penalize such transaction? But if he buys it on a board of trade or chamber of commerce or through a grain exchange he is absolved from the penalties of the provision.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an observation in connection with his last remark?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator, in a sense, addressed me as representing in part the State of New York, and inquired, perhaps indirectly, what my opinion would be as to the effect of this legislation. I happen to know, Mr. President, may I state to the Senator from North Dakota, that neither the flour mills nor the produce dealers in the State of New York, upon which agencies the farmers in that State very largely depend, are able to buy as the result of the pendency of this legislation.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that, Mr. President. Does the Senator think that this measure will help that condition?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. GRONNA. I am glad to have the judgment of the distinguished Senator from New York. If other Senators will give it the attention that I have given to it, I know that many of them will become assured that my position is correct.

Now, let us see. I congratulate Mr. Barnes. He is a splendid gentleman. I have done a good deal of business with his house, the firm of Ames, Brooks & Co. They are a good firm, large exporters of wheat and other grain from Duluth. They are splendid people, and, as I have said, I congratulate Mr. Barnes on being successful—more so than I have been—in his argument with those who are directing that this legislation shall pass, and also perhaps with the committee.

But, Mr. President, we are doing this all in the interest of the farmer. I read an article in the newspaper the other day written by some gentleman who at one time was a member of this body for a few months, who said that all that the people in North Dakota seemed to care for was $2 wheat. Well, $2 wheat, as I understand, is provided for in this measure, and still we find that the farmers of my State, I believe, are opposed to this bill because it does not do justice to all the people. It does not do justice to labor, as the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] so eloquently pointed out on yesterday, and in my judgment it does an injustice to the farmers of the country. The result will be that the entire country will suffer from it, and, instead of being a measure to stimulate production, it will embarrass the farmer and will lessen production, in my judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves that field of inquiry will he permit me to ask who will decide what is hoarding and what is not hoarding and what is the opportunity for favoritism?

Mr. GRONNA. I presume that the food administrator will decide that because he is the czar supreme in this case.

Mr. SHERMAN. Can he or his subordinates with justice attend to holding the ownership of all the grain in the United States?

Mr. GRONNA. Well, my opinion is, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, that men who are not acquainted with the conditions can not do justice to the people engaged in this industry.

We have heard eloquent pleas from those who are defending the administration—and I want to say that I stand ready to defend the administration as much as any individual if it needs any defense. Those who belong to the administration have called attention to the fact that the public has been preyed upon by the organizations known as chambers of commerce and boards of trade. I desire to read a statement attributed by the newspaper from which I quote to the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture to the effect that the so-called middlemen are taking millions of dollars of the people's money wrongfully.

Mr. BRADY. From what paper is the Senator reading?

Mr. GRONNA. I am reading an editorial from the Co-Operators' Herald, published at Fargo. N. Dak. It is a farm paper. It speaks very highly of Mr. Vrooman. I do not happen to be acquainted with Mr. Vrooman, but I understand he is a splendid gentleman and a very able man. The editorial says:

> Those who heard the addresses of Carl Vrooman, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, on the occasion of his recent visit to Fargo, took heart in the belief that the Federal administration will demand that the wealth of the Nation shall be made to bear its share of the cost of war.

The editorial proceeds to discuss that matter. I shall not read the whole editorial, for it is a long one, but it goes on to show that the farmer and the consumer have both been robbed, that the middleman has profited unduly, and yet the conference committee, the Congress, and the administration are going to turn over the work of carrying out this measure to these very men who have been charged, not by myself but by some members of the administration, by a class of farmers who belong to what is known as the Nonpartisan League, with profiting unduly in the trade in which they are engaged.

I desire to read from a little pamphlet a statement purporting to have been made by Mr. Hoover, which I think I have read in other publications. This little pamphlet approves the statement by Mr. Hoover. It is headed "Two hundred and fifty million dollar loot on flour alone," and goes on to say:

> In the first five months alone of 1917 speculators and big millers—who often are one and the same—extorted the enormous sum of $250,000,000 in one item of flour, according to the statement made by Herbert C. Hoover, prospective food administrator, before the United States Senate Committee on Agriculture at Washington, on June 19, 1917. "With righteous manufacturers and distributors' prices," Mr. Hoover declares, "the price of flour should not have been over $9 a barrel." Yet it averages $14. In the last five months, on the item of flour alone, $250,000,000 has been extracted from the American consumer in excess of normal profits of manufacturers and distributors.
> Mr. Hoover added that the United States has been experiencing "unprecedented prices and rampant speculation." As an example he cited the canning trade. Already the entire output of vegetables and fish for 1917 has been disposed of before it has even reached the canners. "Thousands of men," he said, "who never before owned a dollar's worth of foodstuff are now speculating in necessities." Mr. Hoover predicted further high prices. He said that in Belgium, with all its wheat imported, bread prices were 60 per cent lower than here, while those in England and France were 30 to 40 per cent lower, yet the producers obtained market prices for their wheat.

Mr. President, I am reading this statement for the purpose of showing that the agricultural people of the West believe that they have been injured by the men who are engaged in the industry as middlemen, and especially by the millers and those who are members of the grain exchanges. Those of you who were here on Saturday heard an article read from a paper in my State stating that one of these men—one who for 20 years has been a great factor on these grain exchanges—has been selected as the food administrator in our section of the country. The very men who have been criticized by Congress, by political speakers, and even by men who are identified with this administration are the very men who are being selected to administer this law. Already we have two here. Mr. Barnes has been here, to my knowledge. He was here more than a month ago assisting in perfecting this bill. Now, according to the article in the press, Mr. Frank L. Cary, of the firm of Hallett & Cary, is also to be given a position. For many years I have done business with a number of these men. I do not recollect having done business with this particular firm, but I say I have done business with nearly all of them, and when we ship grain to them they always do the very best they can for their customers, trying to give them as good a price as they can, and I am not finding any fault with them in that way. But they are the very men whom some of the men belonging to this administration and the farmers and political speakers have designated as gamblers in food products. These are the men who are being appointed to administer this law.

There would have been no necessity for the farmers of my State and the farmers of other States to perfect farmers' organizations unless they believed they had a right to complain. This farmer organization is a tremendous organization. They have perfected organizations in at least 12 States, to my knowledge. This organization has charged that the members of these great exchanges have unduly profited by their transactions; that they have been the cause of manipulating prices, to the detriment of the producer and to the detriment of the consumer; yet these are the very men who are being selected to administer this law.

Mr. President, personally, I am not one of those who believe that men who are engaged in business are dishonest. I do not think they are. I think they are just as honest as the men who live on the farm. I do not say that these grain exchanges have not been the cause of depressing prices to the producers and at times enhancing prices to the consumers; but, Mr. President, I shall not go into that branch of the subject further.

This bill has been said to be a bill to help stimulate production and to reduce the cost of living to the consumer. How it can do both of these things I can not understand. It is a singular thing, however, if it is such a great benefit to the people to have their products included in this bill, that the people of the South protest so vigorously against this measure. I received to-day a communication from the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, the Louisiana division, at Eunice, La., inclosing three resolutions protesting most bitterly against including cotton in this bill. Now, if it is such a blessing to the people of our country, why do you refuse to include your product in the bill? It seems to be the unanimous opinion of the people of the South that they do not wish to be hampered by this legislation. It seems to be the unanimous opinion of the men engaged in the great manufacturing industries that they do not want to be controlled by this legislation, and every one of them has been successful in being eliminated with the exception of the grain farmers, the small middlemen, and the canning factories of the country.

Perhaps it will be said that the farmers of the country, that the canning concerns of the country, that the labor of the country, are the ones who need to be restricted during the war. Perhaps it will be said by some statesmen here that it is absolutely necessary to control prices of farmers' products because they are getting too rich. If I wanted to take the time of the Senate this afternoon, I could show you the farm-mortgage debt of this country, and it would stagger you to learn of the aggregate amount of these farm mortgages. I could show you that millions of these farms are occupied by tenants. If farming is such a profitable industry, why is there need of having any tenants? Why do not people go into the business for themselves? Because it will only be a year or two, or a few years, until they could pay off these mortgages. Is not that argument sound?

The facts are, Mr. President, that the farmers have never made any great amount of money out of farming, especially not out of raising grain. They have been compelled, as I said a moment ago, to effect organizations to see that justice is done to them; and in the face of that this administration, I say, appoints as supervisors of the farmers the very men who have been charged with trading and dealing with the farmers' products to the detriment of the farmers and to the detriment of the consumers.

I want to say further that I am not satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], in charge of the bill, of the proviso of section 6, the new matter which has been inserted by the committee of conference—a thing they had no right to do. I said on Saturday that I should raise the point of order, but on sober second thought I have reconsidered that, and I shall not do so. I know that the Senate is anxious to vote. I know that any Senator occupying the chair could not help but hold that this was new matter, and that it would have to go out on a point of order, but I shall not make it. As I started to say, the Senator from Oregon has not convinced me that the new matter written into the bill by the committee of conference does not in spirit and in fact exempt transactions on any grain exchange from the penalty of section 6. You can not buy from a farmer or from a canner to exceed a certain limited amount, but you can buy all you please through a grain exchange, and this proviso of the section will protect you.

Is that justice? Is that justice to the millers scattered all over this country—compelling them to go to these grain exchanges to buy their grain, compelling the producers to market all their grain through one channel? Why, if I had 100,000 bushels of wheat, I could not sell that amount of grain, under the provisions of this bill, to a miller unless I sold it through a grain exchange; but I might sell millions of bushels through the grain exchange, and I would not be subject to the penalty of section 6.

Speaking of these grain exchanges, I want briefly to call attention to a statement in this book issued by the Nonpartisan League. This league now have their headquarters in the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, but they have organizations in other States also.

Already, as I said a moment ago, Mr. President, the small mills of the country have almost been eliminated. We had in North Dakota in 1911, 71 flour mills; in 1912, 60; in 1913, 62; in 1914, 59; in 1915, 58; and in 1916 we had but 59, showing that the little mills are being gradually eliminated. In the State of Minnesota they had in 1911, 274; in 1912, 264; in 1913, 252; in 1914, 247; in 1915, 226; and in 1916 they had but 210. It simply goes to show that they are being absorbed by these larger institutions.

Mr. President, I call attention to a statement made by Mr. Greeley, who testified before a Senate committee a few years ago on this subject. Mr. Greeley testified that at the lowest estimate the transactions in futures on the Chicago Board of Trade amounted to three hundred times the entire volume of wheat handled in a year. In plain language, for every bushel of real wheat handled 300 bushels of imaginary wheat were bought and sold. On a single day, Mr. Greeley testified, he had seen 25 Chicago firms buy and sell 5,000,000 bushels of grain for future delivery. On many a day he had bought or sold a million bushels of grain and thought nothing of it.

Willet M. Hays, formerly Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, stated in an article published in January, 1913, in the publication of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, on page 253, that the dealing in grain futures on the Chicago Board of Trade amounted to at least 90,000,000 bushels annually. So if you produce a billion bushels a year, they sell as much on that single board of trade in a single year as you could produce in 90 years.

Compared to this estimate, Mr. Greeley's estimate of 17,000,000,000 bushels a year is extremely modest; yet, at the highest, the average yearly receipts of wheat at Chicago do not exceed about 50,000,000 bushels. That is about all the actual delivery of wheat you will find in Chicago—about 50,000,000 bushels.

I am calling attention to these facts, Senators, to show that the very men whom you are so anxious to put out of business are the very men you are placing in control of the farmers' business. They are going to be the trusted guardians to take care of the farmers of the West. The Rockefeller interests; and I want to say for your information that there is a great deal of Rockefeller money, there is a great deal of Armour money, there is a great deal of money from all these great moneyed men invested in these terminals. While they may not personally be engaged in the business, they have their representatives there.

Mr. President, I could go on here for a considerable length of time and discuss these transactions, but I shall not do so. I simply want to call attention for a moment to section 1.

Farm implements have been included in the controlled list. Everybody knows that this is only a sop to the farmer. Any sensible man knows that if you do not control steel you can not control the price of farm machinery to the farmer.

Every sensible man knows that if the implement manufacturers are obliged to pay $100 a ton or more for steel—a product which they buy in normal times at about $30 a ton—manufacturers can not make farm machinery cheap to the farmer. But we might have done an injustice to these infant industries, such as the Steel Trust, which declared only $271,000,000 dividend in 1916. We might easily, I say, do an injustice to this infant trust if we should compel it to do business in a restricted market to be supervised by the Government of the United States. And so, Mr. President, the Congress of the United States has been charitable.

That reminds me of the Biblical verse which says—

Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

Oh, Mr. President, in this charitable spirit, Congress has seen fit to eliminate this blessed Steel Trust; it has seen fit to let this infant industry, the Rockefeller Standard Oil Co., go unhampered; but it has tried to blindfold the farmer, and added "fuel oil," thinking the Member of Congress can go out on the rostrum and explain to the farmer that he at least believes that "fuel oil" means kerosene and gasoline, when there is not a Senator on this floor who does not know that it means no such thing.

You have made it impossible for the implement manufacturers to sell farm implements cheaply to the farmers, because you have eliminated the raw product. Is there any Senator who will deny that? That applies to farm implements and applies to tools of all kinds. You have made it impossible, I say, for the consumers of kerosene and gasoline to compel these men to at least sell in a restricted market, and then, if their prices were unduly enhanced, the President of the United States could, if he wanted to, compel them to reduce their prices. You have seen fit to eliminate that.

Speaking in part for the farmers of my State and for the people of my State, I deny the charge made that all that our people are interested in is two-dollar wheat. The people of my State are more interested in seeing that justice is done to all the people than they are in two-dollar wheat, and we know that justice is not being done to labor in this bill.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this bill might be termed political feudalism. That is about all it will amount to. I want to say that there is too much intelligence among the American people to be satisfied with feudal lords. The people will resent it. The people are obedient to law, they are loyal, they are patriotic, but they know they are living in a free country.

There is another provision in which I was deeply interested.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will yield for just a moment, the Senator mentioned the name of Mr. Julius Barnes as advocating this bill. I know the Senator would not intentionally do him an injustice.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I would not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am very sure that Mr. Barnes has never advocated the passage of any bill. I have known him for many years. He is a gentleman of very high character and ability, and he was asked to come here and aid to the extent that he could. He has never mentioned the passage of the bill to me, and I do not think he has to any Senator or Representative. He resigned his business and liquidated it before he even consented to take hold and do what he could. I think he is a man of the highest business ability and high character.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator, and I think I so stated—that I believe that Mr. Barnes is a patriotic citizen. If I said that he was here just for the purpose of advocating this bill, I made a misstatement. I knew that he was here at the request of somebody connected with this administration, that he was serving in that capacity, and I am also reasonably sure that the provision which I have criticized was written by Mr. Barnes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am quite sure the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. GRONNA. Because any lawyer coming from the State of California and not being familiar with grain transactions would not have been able to have drawn the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. I can assure the Senator in that regard he is mistaken. Mr. Barnes did not write any part of it.

Mr. GRONNA. If he has not written it he has inspired it. I am quite sure of that, because it is a mighty hard thing to beat a man at his own game, I will say to the Senator. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that Mr. Barnes and the firm he was connected with are people of high standing and good character. I have done business with them for many years. I am simply calling attention to the fact that the very men against whom this criticism has been directed are the men who are being appointed to administer this law.

There is another provision in which I am much interested, and that is the prohibition section. In the form that it comes back from the committee of conference you might just as well eliminate it from the bill, because it will not satisfy the temperance people. It is a sham and a fraud, and the Senate knows it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the food-control bill as it first came to Congress was generally supposed to apply alone to foods and fuel. It really extended practically to every industry and to the raw material required for production. It certainly extended to cotton, the great raw material produced by my immediate constituents.

It declared control over food from the planting by the farmer until consumption took place upon the table. There was no condition in the country which required such extreme legislation. To have carried control to the extent contemplated was unnecessary and would have been unwise. I would not have voted for the bill as it was first presented to Congress. I attacked it in the cloakroom of the Senate and in the press, insisting always it should be greatly modified.

It has now been restricted to foods and fuel, to agricultural implements, and to fertilizers. The purpose of the bill now is to put the Government in position to control supplies for military purposes, and to prevent middlemen and speculators from using the opportunities, which war conditions have brought about, to force the cost of foods to prices which consumers could not stand.

The provisions of the bill applicable to coal are broad and far reaching, and the machinery furnished for protecting the public from oppression by coal owners is much more comprehensive than that contained in the original bill.

Foods and fuel are necessaries of life, standing in a class by themselves. They must be had day by day to preserve life.

The right of the Government in time of war to regulate these prime necessities may well be urged as growing out of the power of Congress to conduct the war.

The right to control food and fuel can be sustained for reasons entirely different from those which would affect such commodities as cotton.

I can not say that I am entirely pleased with all the provisions of the bill as it comes now before us. We made amendments to the bill when it was in the Senate which I supported, some of which I never yielded in conference. One especially occurs to me.

When great powers are placed in the hands of the President which he can not possibly himself perform, the legislation placing those powers should designate the public officials who are to execute the powers for the President.

When the bill was in the Senate I supported the amendment to create a board of three to be known as the food-control board. I voted for that Senate amendment at all times in the conference. But a majority of the conferees of the Senate and a majority of the conferees of the House have agreed upon a bill.

The general purposes of the bill I approve. We can not hope to obtain in legislative measures what each of us individually would prefer. The House and 96 Members of the Senate must pass upon it. Legislation must come from mutual concession or legislation can not be passed.

I therefore, Mr. President, shall accept the action of the conferees and vote to sustain the report of the conferees, or, rather, if I am here when the vote takes place I shall vote to concur in the conference report. I am planning to leave the city to-night, and there may not be a vote before I leave. For that reason, finding that my general pair, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], would vote as I would vote, I have arranged with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who intended to vote against the conference report, to pair with me, and if I am out of the city he will refrain from voting against the report and announce a pair with me, as I would vote for the bill.

There are a number of measures which have come before the Senate since the war began that did not meet the approval of all of us in their details, although we did approve their general purposes.

Under such circumstances I conceive it to be the duty of a Senator to help make the legislation conform as nearly as possible to his view of what it should be.

But finally having done this, he should yield to the majority and not oppose a measure because he does not agree to all of its provisions. This can be done without considerable delay, and delay should, if possible, be avoided.

I support this measure as I have every other measure intended to strengthen our Nation in the war.

The first great question before us is: How can we mobilize the strength of the Nation and place it where we can defeat our enemies? How can we utilize our resources so that we may bring the war at the earliest possible moment to a successful conclusion?

This has been the purpose which has controlled me in every vote that I have cast since war was declared, and following that purpose I vote to support the report of the conferees, although there are features of the bill which I do not approve.

The way to win this war is to fight fast and fight hard. Such a course will save life and save waste.

We are in the war. We must win the war, and we must waste no time doing it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] started out in a defense of the attitude of the Senators in considering this bill, and in criticism of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] for his criticism of the long delay that had occurred in the consideration of the measure. In that statement the Senator said that he had not delayed the passage of the bill for 10 minutes. Often when we rise and begin talking we sometimes think we will talk 10 minutes, and then we wind up by having spoken for more than an hour, as did the Senator from North Dakota.

I have not any doubt that every word the Senator has said has been felt by him to be a correct criticism of the bill, but, Mr. President, most of the discussion in this debate has been not upon the conference report, but upon the entire bill.

Senators have discussed over and over again the questions that were discussed in the consideration of the bill itself. While the Senator from North Dakota was talking I turned to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose of ascertaining the history, as it is termed, of this bill. On June 14, 1917, there was reported without recommendation to the Senate Senate bill 2463, which was practically the same as this bill introduced in the House. The discussion of the bill in the Senate began on the 16th of June. In the meantime there had been introduced in the House of Representatives the same bill, which was passed in that body on June 23, six or seven weeks ago. The vote by which it was passed was 365 to 5. Generally when there is such a unanimous sentiment Senators do not ordinarily discuss the measure. They recognize there is no possible way of overcoming the vote, and for that reason very little discussion is usually indulged in. In the Senate the House bill was substituted for the Senate bill and the discussion was continued. It was hoped this bill would be passed by the 1st day of July, because at that time harvesting begins to take place and the wheat ought to go in the market somewhere near that time. By reason of the delay a condition has occurred which is very deplorable, the markets have been disturbed by reason of the fact that no one could tell what would be the state of the wheat market in the United States.

That bill in the Senate was discussed day after day until on the 21st day of July of this year a vote was taken. It was then found that it was a vote of 81 Senators to 6 Senators in favor of the measure. It seems to me in view of that great majority Senators would conclude that as it was so nearly unanimous there should be very little discussion upon the conference report.

Mr. President, it is true that hardly any Senator has gotten exactly what he wants in the conference report. The product of the minds of many never exactly suits any. Yet you can readily see some one must yield or we never would agree. This is an emergency measure. It is a measure that should have been passed weeks ago. I can not understand the policy of people who want to defer the passage of a bill which they know will pass by a large majority. Yet, notwithstanding the fact of such an overwhelming majority, why should there be prolonged debate?

Mr. President, there has been eliminated from the bill the war-expense commission, and the explanation of the conference committee is very plain and clear. We have some fundamental principles that control conferees. One of those is that wherever one body has placed upon a bill passed by the other House a provision which is not germane and the conferees can not agree it is the duty of the conferees of the body that put on the amendment to withdraw it and to recede.

Mr. President, that was exactly the situation with relation to this expense commission, and when the Senate conferees receded no one has any complaint or should have any complaint because Senators have the remedy of introducing an independent bill and bringing that measure before the Senate for passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And let me suggest to the Senator, so that it may go into the RECORD, that such a measure has been introduced and is upon the calendar.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand an independent measure has been reported and is now upon the calendar.

Mr. President, as to whether there should be a food commission or whether there should be a one-man administrator I took the view in the discussion of the bill that it was eminently right that one man should control the administration of the bill. I believe, as it is a war measure, that unless you have one man to administer the provisions you are going to have divided councils just like all commissions divide, because men have not the same opinions upon hardly two questions.

Mr. President, I believe that the conference committee acted wisely in so doing, because it is absolutely indispensable to quick administration that there should be one food administrator instead of a commission, and I want to congratulate them upon that.

There are other provisions of the bill, some of which I concur in, some of which I do not; but we must come to an agreement upon some measure, and the only way when we can not have our own way is to submit to the bill unless it violates those fundamental principles that a man feels are so important to his country that he can not yield. I have not any doubt that every Senator who is going to vote against the bill has that view of the provisions of the bill, and yet he knows, as I know and everybody else should know, that this conference report should be determined quickly, and nothing we say and nothing we do will in any manner change the final result of the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I think it is important that the conference report should be speedily adopted, and I shall vote in favor of its adoption.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think if each Senator was to write a bill it would meet his own approval, but it would not meet the approval of every other Senator; and while there are some things in this conference report that I do not like, I propose to vote for it.

I rose to add a word to the wheat discussion which occurred a few weeks ago. I feel it important, in view of the course the debate took at that time. It was proposed to fix a minimum price of $2 per bushel. That was insisted upon strenuously by some of the Senators from the wheat-producing States, so called. My colleague made the statement that up to a year or more ago the farmers of Ohio would have been glad to have had $1 per bushel wheat guaranteed to them. He stated the fact accurately. Of course the cost of production has increased within the past year.

I did not feel at the time the amendment was pending before the Senate that we ought to fix $2 as a minimum price. My belief was that the price should be fixed under legislative authority by the food commission. I feel so now.

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] presented an amendment to eliminate the minimum price, and his purpose, as I understood it, was to leave this to the administrative board or the food administrator, as the case might be.

It must be borne in mind that the sole purpose for fixing a minimum price, whether by legislation or by administration, was to increase the production.

Now, in order that we may have a little light upon this subject, which comes from the real farmers of the country, I want to submit some figures which were gathered by Hon. A. P. Sandles, of my own State, who, about two years ago, was the president of our agricultural board and who is one of the most energetic and most intelligent public officials we have ever had and who has given especial study to the subject of farming in our State.

He sent out a series of letters to the farmers of Ohio asking them, among other questions, to name a minimum price and a maximum price, and he asked them to name the prices not that they believed in but that the farmers of their respective neighborhoods believed in. Some of the farmers, a few of them, were opposed to the fixing of any price. He had replies from more than 100 of these farmers; they were among the most intelligent farmers of the State. I am going to give the Senate the benefit of these figures.

Among those who named minimum prices one man favored a minimum price of 75 cents per bushel; 12, $1 per bushel; 1, $1.20 per bushel; 13, $1.25 per bushel; 1, $1.35 per bushel; 44, $1.50 per bushel; 8, $1.75 per bushel; and 15, $2 per bushel.

The maximum prices were as follows: Two named $1 per bushel; 11, $1.50 per bushel; 4, $1.75 per bushel; 2, $1.80 per bushel; 1, $1.85 per bushel; 1, $1.90 per bushel; 41, $2 per bushel; 7, $2.25 per bushel; 17, $2.50 per bushel; 7, $3 per bushel; and 1, $3.50 per bushel.

The average minimum price was $1.49; the average maximum price was $2.102.

I think this ought to indicate that the farmers of Ohio are patriots and not devoted wholly to profit making during this world war.

Mr. WADSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri for that purpose?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. REED. These same Ohio farmers are not now holding their wheat for more than $2 a bushel?

Mr. POMERENE. I will have to answer the Senator as he would anticipate my answer to be, I do not know. I imagine they would be quite willing to take what the general market may give.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator might know, in view of the fact that there is practically no delivery of wheat to-day. I will just call his attention to the market.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize very fully what the market prices are now, and the Ohio farmers, like everybody else, perhaps, are willing to take the market price and would desire to take it, but I am speaking of guaranteed prices. What should the Government do under the circumstances? How much should the Government guarantee in order to increase production? The result is as given here, that the average minimum price which they name is $1.49 per bushel and the average maximum price $2.10 per bushel.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from New York pardon me to put a small part of this New York market report from the New York Tribune in the RECORD?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Just this clause:

AUGUST 7.

The big crop promise for coarse grains and potatoes will help to solve the food problem. Farmers, however, have taken a very determined stand and are refusing to sell their wheat except in very small volumes, despite the high prices prevailing.

The prices in New York for cash delivery on August 7 were $2.60 to $2.63. In connection with the statement, if the Senator from New York will pardon me further, I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from Mr. Jewell Mayes, who is the secretary of agriculture of the State of Missouri, a telegram that I received this morning. Mr. Mayes is one of the best posted men in my State, a student of farming, a student of farm conditions, and a man of very great intelligence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

COLUMBIA, MO., August 6, 1917.

Hon. JAMES REED,
Washington, D. C.:

Missouri farmers strong for $2-wheat minimum from now till January 1, 1919. Please do not personally approve any reduction of amount. Understand that bill now waives all reference to 1917 wheat prices as now stands in conference. Kindly communicate this information to Senators STONE, GORE, and also to Senator in charge of $2-wheat amendment. Farmers from every county, in writing, urge not less than $2 minimum.

JEWELL MAYES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I had not intended to commence my few observations on this bill with a discussion of the minimum-price feature, but the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has presented some figures here which are interesting, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has made some interesting comments on them. The figures presented by the Senator from Ohio in my humble judgment, illustrate the fallacy of this whole thing. There are no two men in the United States who will agree as to what the minimum price upon any farm product shall be. It is literally impossible for a farming industry stretching over a territory 3,000 miles wide east and west and 1,500 miles in extent north and south to come to any agreement as to the minimum fixed guaranteed price on any one product.

The principal element in the equation in establishing a price which shall reward the man who tills the ground and sows the seed and harvests the crop is the number of bushels per acre that he harvests. Two dollars as a minimum price upon wheat may be entirely proper and in the right proportion upon land that produces 11 or 12 bushels per acre, but upon lands which produce 25 to 40 bushels per acre it is excessive.

I voted against the amendment which was inserted in the bill fixing the price at $2 by statute, because I believe it is impossible for any legislative body to fix a price with such a degree of accuracy as to withstand the strain that will come upon it in the months and years to come. I very much doubt, Mr. President, whether Mr. Hoover or any other gentleman, or any commission selected no matter by what means, can fix a minimum price upon wheat to be grown in a country of the extent and varying climatic conditions of the United States in such a way as to guarantee to all the producers of that article a profitable return upon their investment and at the same time prevent exorbitant returns to the most favorably situated farmer.

The same might be said of products other than those of wheat. I have had some experience in raising wheat, and also other grains. At the risk of boring the Senators who are present with a brief recital of a personal experience, let me say that while most farmers rejoiced last autumn when the price of beans went to $7.25 per bushel and later went to $9 per bushel and even later went to $11 per bushel, those enhanced prices did not do very much good to the man whose crop yielded only 1 bushel per acre, which was my case, as contrasted with a normal production of 20 to 25 bushels per acre.

It will do no good to place a minimum price, we will say, of $6 or $7 per bushel upon beans, which was seriously suggested before the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, if the man who plants the beans gets only 1 bushel per acre.

I have no confidence that there is anything in this bill in the nature of minimum-price fixing that will stimulate and increase acreage for 1918 to the extent claimed by those who so faithfully and confidingly believe in the powers of a fiat declaration expressed either in a statute or in a proclamation or regulation issued by some individual or commission.

Two-dollar wheat will be profitable over a part of the country if the normal yield per acre is maintained. If it is not maintained, it will not be profitable. Some have said that in that event the man who produces the wheat will get a higher price than the minimum price; that, there being a scarcity and the demand remaining the same, the market price received by the farmer will be in excess of the minimum price fixed by statute. That would be true, Mr. President, if the markets remained open, but this bill does not permit the markets to remain open, and I am very much mistaken, sir, if it will not turn out to be a fact that the minimum price will become the maximum price.

I am not complaining at the figure of $2 per bushel for wheat. That will amply reward the farmers of Ohio; it will amply reward the farmers of New York, whose average production is in excess of 20 bushels per acre over a period of 10 years; and, Mr. President, I think the price of $2 will amply reward the constituents of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]; but in the event that a certain large section of the country, be it the East or the West or the Southwest, has a crop failure next year, in the harvesting season of 1918, and in the event that the markets in their free interchange and play have been closed by this legislation, the $2 price will not reward the man who has only raised half a crop. The fixed guaranteed minimum price, Mr. President, is in no way a panacea.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course the Senator from New York realizes that if the wheat crop should be a total failure $100 a bushel would not pay the farmer for his labor?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator, of course, suggests an impossible situation. The wheat crop is never a total failure. Our country is so enormous that we may have a devastating drought in the Northwest and a perfect season in the East, and vice versa.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. KING. If there is a partial failure, as suggested by the statement of the Senator from New York, would not, though there was a minimum price of $2 fixed for wheat, the price of wheat be far above that, so that the partial failure of the crop would result in higher prices to the farmer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that would be true if it were not for other provisions in the bill; it is thoroughly understood, I assume, that by this bill the laws of supply and demand, so far as applied to the distribution and marketing of wheat, are to be suspended. It is the announced intention of the food administrator to do that very thing. The Government is to take complete charge, I assume, under the licensing provision of this bill, of the entire wheat distribution. Having done that, is there any open market left? Of course not. I venture these observations to try to show that no matter what price we fix as a minimum price for wheat, it will not be a panacea for the farmer who has raised but half a crop due to some climatic catastrophe in the region in which he lives.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. REED. We must treat this question from the practical standpoint, of course. That means that we should eliminate in considering it all extreme and remarkable and unusual cases; and eliminating them, are we not brought to this as a matter of absolute fairness of statement: That the market of the farmer has been taken away; that a concern is already organized which is to be the sole agent through which wheat will be sent to the allied countries, and probably to the entire world outside of the United States; that it is proposed to have the food administrator take possession of the American market; and that, by reason of these changes, there is no free and open market left to the farmer, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has well said? Under those circumstances, if the farmer were to plant and there was no legal guaranty offered—either a guaranty fixed by statute or a guaranty fixed by the food administrator under the statute—the farmer, of course, would not know what he was going to get at all, would he? That would be the shape he would be in. Is that not true? Would any farmer, with any degree of judgment, under those circumstances, plant a large crop of wheat?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, would depend entirely upon what other farm products were bringing at the same time.

Mr. REED. Well, assume that other farm products have been to a degree let alone and that they are ordinarily profitable. Is it not true that the farmer would be discouraged to plant under those circumstances? Surely the Senator from New York can not differ from me on that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, the Senator from New York does not differ from the Senator from Missouri on that.

Mr. REED. If that is true, then the market having been taken away, the farmer being left so that he does not know what he would get at all, and, therefore, being discouraged to plant, does it not follow that there must be some kind of a guaranty offered to him in order to induce him to plant?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think, perhaps, the Senator from Missouri has misunderstood me, and it is probably my own fault. I am not opposing granting the power to the Government of fixing a minimum price upon wheat for the benefit of the man who produces the wheat, and who no longer enjoys a free market, as the Senator from Missouri has described. My observations upon this point were elicited by the figures presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], which tended to create the impression that a dollar a bushel was enough for wheat in Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I hardly think the Senator from New York is justified in drawing such a conclusion from what I stated. What I said was that up to a year, or perhaps two years ago I think I should have stated, the farmers of Ohio would have been very glad to have contracted to sell their entire crop of wheat at $1 a bushel. I said what I did in view of the $2 minimum price which was fixed in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I gave also to the Senate figures which indicated that the average minimum price which the farmers thought should be fixed, if one were to be fixed, was $1.49 a bushel. I tried to point out that they were being dealt with exceedingly liberally under this provision, notwithstanding some of the pessimistic statements which had been made on the floor with regard to the farmer's condition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio can not get into an argument with me upon that question. I agree with him, but I commented upon the figures which he indicated as being proper and fair and generous when applied to the farmers of Ohio to show how difficult and well-nigh impossible it is to take the same figures and spread them over the vast continent which is covered by this country. I endeavored to point out the extreme difficulty of fixing the price for any agricultural product which shall operate evenly all over the United States. That is all.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I feel that under the present conditions there ought to be a minimum price fixed, but I think it should be determined as a matter of administration and not as a matter of legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I agree with the Senator. I voted against placing the $2 figure in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, I do not quite understand what we are quarreling about.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what I have been wondering.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator from Ohio leaves the Chamber, I should like to quarrel with him a moment.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Missouri and I can not quarrel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from New York permit me to put only one question to the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Ohio and the Senator from New York agree that it is better to have an administrator name a price than to name that price by law, one of the reasons, I suppose, being that the administrator could be closer to the time and could fix a price closer to the time when the crop was made, and thus come nearer fixing an equitable price?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, of course, when we sow we are not able to tell what we are going to reap.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, that being the case, will the Senator from Ohio tell us why, when this bill was sent away from the Senate fixing the minimum price for the crop of wheat of 1917, the marketing of which is to occur within the next 12 months, that the conferees propose to make the bill apply to a crop which will not be harvested until 12 months from this date, thus by legislation undertaking to go a year further into the future, and running counter to the very doctrine the Senator has just announced?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, I do not have access to the secrets of the conference committee and the Senator from Missouri can speculate on that subject quite as well as I can.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Ohio does not have the secrets of the conference committee, perhaps; neither have I; but the Senator has so enthusiastically approved the work of the conference committee that I thought, perhaps, he could, out of his very capacious intellect, pick out a reason.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, I said expressly that there were some things in this conference report of which I did not approve, but I also realize that legislation of this character must be the result of compromise, and for that reason I am in favor of the adoption of this conference report, and that at the very earliest moment practicable.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. President, I had not intended to detain the Senate with a discussion of the minimum-price feature of the bill to such an extent as has transpired. At the risk, however, Mr. President, of being scolded, as other Senators have been scolded, and at the risk even of having my loyalty to the Government questioned at this time, I desire to make some observations as to the changes which have taken place in this bill, and which have been brought about principally in the committee of conference.

Before, however, I proceed to a discussion of the three matters which I regard as important, I want to make some observations, in the utmost frankness, about the fate and treatment of the so-called food-survey bill. It has been referred to I know several times during this debate, but the phase of it which I regard as most important has not been touched upon.

It was certain that sooner or later Congress would enact legislation punishing hoarding and food gambling. The Senate attempted to do that at the very outset of the discussion by inserting a provision in the so-called food-survey bill for that purpose.

It is unfortunate, of course, that that particular kind of legislation should have been delayed thus far, but it was bound to be enacted sooner or later, I take it. Also, I think it fair to say that the provision inserted at the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] having to do with the regulation of grain exchanges was sooner or later bound to be inserted in legislation upon this bill or some other bill. It is unfortunate, in my humble judgment, that it has not been done sooner than this; but it is going to be done, and that very shortly, and with both proposals I am in entire agreement.

However, Mr. President, there were other features of that survey bill, to which I alluded about three weeks ago when I attempted to explain my views to the Senate upon this situation, which it is now too late to take care of. The original purpose of the so-called food-survey bill was adequately described by its title to inaugurate and carry to completion a survey of the food resources and the productivity of the United States and to establish, by education, if possible, a spirit of conservation and saving amongst our people with respect to the food being produced at this very hour, millions of tons of which have already been harvested.

The Department of Agriculture sent to every State in this Union the outline of a plan to be followed by the State governments through their agricultural colleges and their State extension work in conjunction with the Federal extension work. The Department of Agriculture, confident that the survey bill, carrying certain appropriations to make this work possible, would be passed promptly by the Congress, invited literally thousands and thousands of people, most of them volunteers—invited scores of State governments and State colleges of agriculture—to proceed with the preliminary preparation for this work. That invitation was extended to them within two or three weeks after the declaration of war in April. In response to that invitation, sent out by the Secretary of Agriculture in good faith, mind you, thousands and thousands of dollars were collected in one way or another and thousands and thousands were appropriated by the legislatures, the counties, and the municipalities of the United States to start the work; to start a work, mind you, which could not be successfully performed without the cooperation of the Federal Government, such cooperation in turn to be made possible by the appropriations carried in the so-called food-survey bill.

Mr. President, some power, some person, some influence prevented the enactment of the food-survey bill. It has been held here, sir, for nearly three months without an argument being presented against it. We are told—and I imagine that most of us believe what we are told in this respect—that the delay of that bill was a piece of legislative strategy. It may be, sir, that it was a clever piece of legislative strategy to hold up that bill in order to give the food-control bill some additional prestige, but I assert that, in view of the pledged word of the Federal Government given through the Department of Agriculture, while it may be contended that it was clever political or legislative strategy, it was a breaking of faith with the people of the United States, thousands of whom had proceeded in good faith in their preparations to help the Government in time of war.

The impression has gone all over this land among the thousands of people who thus spent their money and among the State governments and State colleges of agriculture which appropriated sums of money necessary to cooperate with the Federal Government, that there was more of insincerity back of this propaganda than there was of patriotism, for their money has been largely wasted and thrown away in order that somebody here in Washington could accomplish some other ambition.

I have yet to hear from any Senator upon this floor or from any Member of the other House any defense of this action. In my humble judgment, it is an indictment against the sincerity of this entire propaganda; and that indictment is made perfectly plain, sir, when we learn that within 10 minutes after the food-control bill had been agreed upon in conference the survey bill was also agreed upon in conference, showing that it could have been agreed upon in conference nearly three months ago.

I think it due, sir, to the people of the State of New York, who proceeded in good faith in the expectation that the food-survey bill would be promptly acted upon, to make this statement upon the floor of the Senate Chamber, for they have been wondering why it is that the Federal Government has been standing back and not helping them in the manner promised. So much for that phase of this discussion.

Mr. President, it is exceedingly difficult to gauge and analyze the merits of the pending measure. There are some excellent provisions in it, and I am inclined to believe, sir, that the good things are slightly in excess of the bad, or, if I may say so, the dangerous things. The antihoarding clauses, the antifood-gambling clauses are, in my judgment, wise, proper, and timely. I only wish that they had been enacted into law two or three months ago, as was possible.

The provision giving the President the right to commandeer any article produced in the United States for the use of the Army or the Navy or for purposes of the common defense are entirely proper, and I am glad they are in this bill. If the President has not already that power, certainly those provisions should be in this bill, and it may turn out to be unfortunate that they were not enacted at an earlier day. This war is four months old. It would have been wise had we enacted that kind of legislation in April rather than to wait until the middle of August. At any rate, I believe this is one of the valuable features of this bill.

I recognize, too, sir, that there must be in time of war and great stress a degree of regulation imposed upon certain productive activities, and most certainly upon those activities which have to do with the distribution of the essential supplies of the Nation; but I can not drive it from my mind, Mr. President, that the principal function, industrially speaking, of the United States during this war is the function of production. I have said upon a former occasion that we are not in the category of Belgium or of France or even of England. A minimum price fixed in England can be relied upon as covering all their peculiar difficulties, because it is a small country. The same thing is true with respect to France. The Governments of those countries can regulate and control much more easily the industrial activities of their citizens than we can, for they are not essentially and primarily producing countries. We are bound to have high prices in war time—inflated prices; but I am not so much concerned, sir, about what things cost in this country as I am that we shall have plenty of them, so much in excess of our needs that we shall supply our allies in abundance. That is the function of America in this war, in addition to her military function, and without performing it we will fail.

The world and particularly our allies must depend upon our people producing more food, more coal, more steel, than they have ever produced before. It may be, sir, that the powers granted in this bill will not be employed in such a way as to reduce production. As a Senator and as a citizen whose single thought is that this terrific contest shall be brought to an early conclusion through the bringing into it of the might of America, I hope that the gentleman or the gentlemen who will be in charge of the administration of this bill will remember day and night that we must produce things.

Mr. President, there is one section in this bill that causes me anxiety upon that score, and that is the licensing section. It is the one section upon which I have laid emphasis since the day the bill was introduced in every meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and on one former occasion upon this floor. I rejoiced when the Senate amended that section in such a way as to confine the license system proposed in the bill to those industries or to those businesses engaged in the handling or distribution or marketing of foods and fuels. I was ready to concede, as a majority of the Senate was then ready to concede, that it was proper and probably advisable to establish a licensing system to cover cold-storage plants, wheat elevators, packing houses, institutions that handle the essential food supply of our people and through which must be handled the surplus food supply to be sent abroad. I conceded also that, in view of the difficult situation in connection with the coal supply and the high prices of coal, that the provision inserted by the Senate for the licensing of coal operators and coal dealers was a necessary provision. But I rejoiced that the licensing system was confined to those businesses or interests which the majority of the people of the United States recognized as being necessarily subject to regulation.

To be perfectly frank, sir, my heart sank when I learned that the conferees on the part of the Senate, after having had the sense of the Senate upon that very proposal, had yielded upon this point and restored to the bill what might be properly termed a universal licensing system. Under this bill as it comes from the conferees there is scarcely anything of importance in this country that is not to be subject to the licensing system.

Mr. President, I have never known of any extensive business engaged in by thousands and thousands of citizens which could grow and produce more bountifully when subject to governmental license. A license accompanied by government-made regulations is a strait-jacket, and I defy any man to expand when he is wearing a strait-jacket.

I do not think this section is controlling upon the verdict which I shall render or which other Senators shall render upon this bill as a whole; but I take this occasion, Mr. President, to make this appeal, which may, and I hope will, reach the ears of those who are going to administer this law, that they shall be exceedingly careful in exercising the powers of this license section; for if they do as I have heard they intend to do, or as I have heard they have been discussing with the intent of doing, they will so restrain and restrict thousands and thousands of persons and firms, great and small, that they will cramp the production of the United States in the year 1918, and the very purpose of this bill, as I understand it, will be defeated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If it will not interrupt the thread of the Senator's discourse—if so, I will not ask the question—I desire to call his attention to this important fact:

The licensing provision—and I call his attention to line 21 on page 8—as it came to us from the House in the first instance, read:

> Whenever the President shall find that any rate, charge, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee within a reasonable time fixed in the order to discontinue—

And so forth, then the President may, in lieu of the unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory rate fix a rate, and so forth, so that before a business could be seized it was necessary that the President should find as a fact that some unjust practice was being indulged. Now, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the present bill provides—

> That from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries—

He may publicly so announce. There is no requirement of any evil practice, no requirement of any finding against or warning to the licensee; but the President by simple announcement can declare that it is essential, and thereafter if a man shall proceed without a license he may be sent to the penitentiary for two years and fined $5,000, or if he takes out a license he must take it upon the terms and conditions fixed and subject to the regulations made. Now, I ask the Senator if he does not think that the present act, as it comes back to us from the conferees, is much more drastic than the original House act?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is not the slightest doubt about that. It is infinitely more drastic than it was before.

Mr. REED. Now, I ask the Senator if, in his opinion, the Government can close the place of business of a citizen who has committed no crime and has done no wrong, who is engaged in a legitimate and useful business, without making due compensation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My opinion on that subject, of course, is not authoritative, as I have never read law; but I am inclined to believe—in fact, I believe very sincerely—that any such exercise of power on the part of the Government would be unconstitutional.

Mr. REED. May I not ask the Senator one further question? It was generally conceded that when we adopted an amendment providing that the President could seize the whisky and pay for it the cost, plus a profit, that was unconstitutional, because it was the seizing of property without paying the just compensation provided by law. If that was true as to whisky, how can the President seize the mill of the miller, by closing its doors and denying him access to it, without making payment to the miller?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course that raises a very difficult question for any administrator of this act; but I did not intend to lay any emphasis upon the section to which I have been alluding from the standpoint of its constitutionality. My only concern in this matter is that which arises perhaps from the fact that I myself am a business man engaged in endeavoring to produce certain articles which are necessary for the people of the United States and our allies, and I have already seen the effect of the proposals contained in this bill. I know very well, of course, that such a one as I is not listened to very seriously in the councils of those who have been framing the legislation, and I am not entirely despondent upon this question, for I still hope, sir, that the men who are to administer this statute will learn that they can not go forth recklessly, armed with these powers, and operate this license section to the last degree without bringing disaster upon the country. The Congress is about to repose this power in their hands. I assume that this bill will pass, but I did not want this opportunity to go by without expressing my fear—and I think it is a well-grounded fear—that if these powers are exercised to the full, and exercised suddenly and in ignorance and in haste, we will rue the day that we ever conferred these powers.

In another way this section has been amended, and, in my judgment, it is an unnecessary amendment. When the Senate passed it the licensing system was not only confined to those who were actually handling food and fuel, but it was confined in its application to those persons or concerns handling food or fuel whose products entered into interstate commerce. I have never contended, and I am not fit to contend, upon the point of constitutionality that was brought up here when the licensing section was under discussion in the Senate. Some Senators contended that we have a right to extend a licensing system all over the country, regardless of the fact that the products do not enter into interstate commerce, and that we have that right under the war power. I do not pretend to give an opinion upon that question. Other Senators contend that we have the right to extend a licensing system only to those concerns engaged in interstate commerce. I do not give an opinion upon that; but I do contend that for any government in a country of this size to attempt to spread a licensing system upon every person or firm engaged in the handling of any of the necessaries recited in the first section of this bill will present the spectacle of a government attempting the impossible.

Few Senators seem to realize in the consideration of this subject that the bill, as coming from the conference committee, establishes potentially a licensing system which would reach out its long arm and grasp by the shoulder every little business man engaged in the handling of produce everywhere in the United States. He might not do a gross business in excess of four or five thousand dollars a year; he might purchase every one of the articles in which he deals within 10 miles of his little office or warehouse, and he might sell every one of those articles within that same area; he could not possibly be a factor of the slightest importance in the food supply of the United States or our allies; and yet the conferees insisted that he must be subject to license and regulation.

Mr. President, there must be tens and tens of thousands of these people who it is proposed shall be brought under this system. I submit, sir, that there is no necessity whatsoever for it, and if it is attempted it will involve the assumption by the Government and the food administration of a burden of detail so heavy and so complicated that it can not be borne or administered; and if it is attempted, Mr. President, these tens and tens of thousands of little business men—the man who comes to my farm and buys two or three or four hundred fleeces of wool and takes that wool to his little warehouse 5 miles away and sells it to another dealer who lives 30 miles away—everyone like him will live and have his being under a sword of Damocles. He will not be able to tell from one day to the next when the heavy hand of governmental regulation is to fall upon his shoulders.

That is the condition to-day. The food and markets commissioner of the State of New York give an interview in the New York newspapers just the other day in which he called attention to the fact that the small produce dealers out in the rural districts, the men to whom I am referring, are declining to pay to the farmer for his products a price equal to the cost of the production. It would be a blessing, Mr. President, to the future production of the United States if Mr. Hoover would announce upon the earliest possible day that he had no intention of interfering with these tens of thousands of little people, for if this threat is permitted to hang over them for the rest of this season, and as a result they do not feel able or courageous enough to go out among the farmers and purchase their products for cash, next year's acreage of crops will be decreased.

I hope and pray, Mr. President, that the food administration will understand this and take steps accordingly and give some sign that it does understand in a public utterance that will restore confidence to these little produce dealers, upon whom the average farmer must depend for his market.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator from New York think it is rather a humiliating thing for a man representing the great State of New York in the United States Senate to have to offer a petition to Mr. Hoover to withhold his hand?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not feel particularly humiliated—in fact, not at all. We have to face these situations, of course, when the country is at war; and every one of us, including the little produce dealers to whom I have referred, and including all the farmers, and including all the millions and millions of people in the great cities, must be prepared to make certain sacrifices and to surrender, perhaps, a portion of their convictions. But while the people are surrendering a part of their convictions, and violating, perhaps, some of their ancient traditions, in order that the Government may wage war effectively and promptly and have behind it all the might of the United States in men and materials, I do think it timely to utter an appeal such as I am now uttering, an appeal directed to those who are to administer this law, so to conduct themselves, not only in their official acts but in their public utterances, as not to discourage the production of food and materials in the United States; for if they shall fail to give such an assurance, sir, this war will go on three, four, or five years, instead of the one or two years that we expect it may go on.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I simply desire to say that in the question I have just propounded I did not mean to criticize the Senator from New York. I thought that the lesson was one which we might well pause long enough to observe, that we were granting power of such a character that a Senator thought it necessary in advance to caution those who are to exercise the power. I meant no criticism at all of the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I said before, Mr. President, I am not utterly despondent about this question, because it has been my observation that when men are clothed with great authority, and actually have the weapons in their hands, and realize that perhaps the fate of the Nation and the success of the war depends upon their using their weapons wisely, they become conservative and thoughtful, and refrain from carrying out some of the rather wild and extravagant announcements that have been made prior to the reposing of the weapons in their hands. I hope that will turn out to be the case, Mr. President, and I am inclined to believe that it will turn out to be the case; for this problem of food control and control of the industries is so enormous, so intricate, that it can not fail to impress the man into whose hands it is confided.

I have thought upon some occasions, Mr. President, that it was not thus impressing itself. I have thought upon some occasions that the people who are to administer this law were confusing our condition, and failing to recognize what our principal function was, that of production. I have hopes that if heretofore they have failed to comprehend what the United States consists of in an agricultural and industrial sense, and what its functions and duties are at this hour, they will do so before this law is 10 days or two weeks or three weeks old upon the statute books.

Mr. President, ordinarily I have always contended that one man in an administrative office is more efficient and can act with more promptness than a commission of three, four, five, or six. I shall be very frank to the Senate in describing my attitude upon that other amendment which has to do with the composition of this food-control administration. A month ago, sir, I certainly would have voted against a commission of three to administer any law such as this; but as time went on, and I read from day to day in the press of the country the announcements, official and semiofficial, of what was to be done and what was proposed to be done in the event that this statute or something like it was placed upon the statute books, I began to wonder whether any one man should be intrusted with such power; and to be frank, sir, I began to wonder whether the gentleman who is to be intrusted with this power comprehended the problem.

Now, sir, I believe that a tremendous amount of benefit may be done by the food administrator. I believe that it lies within the power of Mr. Hoover to do a tremendous service to this country. I am in hearty accord with the great majority of his recommendations for the prevention of waste in the households of the United States and in our hotels. I am inclined to believe that perhaps we are the most wasteful people on earth. It is not surprising that we are, because we have had the most to waste. We have been the richest and the most prosperous, and we have been able to afford to throw away a good many things of which we could have made use.

Of course, such a condition can not be permitted to exist in time of war, and of course it should not exist in time of peace; and I will not criticize the suggestions of Mr. Hoover with respect to the prevention of waste. I think it is within his power to persuade and perhaps educate, I may say, millions and millions of people so to conduct their lives, their expenditures, and their consumption of articles of food and articles of other sorts, as to bring about a tremendous saving.

The American people stand ready to do that. They will volunteer to do it, and they are volunteering to do it by the hundreds of thousands to-day. But, Mr. President, when I see included among some of these recommendations which are exceedingly patriotic and wise, other recommendations or other announcements which have to do with the production end of this problem, and which are utterly fallacious and I may say even nonsensical, I am forced to stop and think a moment.

The announcement first was made, sir, that the food supply of the United States was decreasing, when every one of us knew that it is increasing. I do not like to see panic and hysteria spread among our people. Then the announcement, sir, was made that if this bill became a law, flour would go down to $9 a barrel, when every one of us knows that with wheat at $2 a bushel such a thing is utterly impossible. It takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. So I began to doubt; I began to wonder if this one man, Mr. Hoover, realized the enormous extent of this problem and this task which we are to confide into his hands, and which we hope and pray will be so performed as to help us in this war. When I read it solemnly printed in the press of the day before yesterday, or the day before that, that a committee of restaurant keepers had come down here to Washington and consulted with the food administration and advised with them, and had gone back, and as a result of that consultation announced a propaganda that every restaurant and hotel keeper in the United States shall buy a calf and raise it until it is 1,000 pounds in weight, I wondered again whether this one man knows what he is talking about. I hope that that kind of propaganda will not be carried on much longer, because it will shake the confidence of every man who has had anything to do either with the restaurant business or with the live-stock business in the efficacy of this administration of the food supply. One is tempted, sir, and I would perhaps yield to the temptation were it not so late, to say something in the nature of an A, B, C of the live-stock business in connection with restaurant keepers raising calves.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will do it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I really do not think the day will come, sir, when I shall see the New Willard Hotel in possession of a calf. [Laughter.] But I did come to the conclusion that it would be wise to have a commission of three, one of whom should know something about farming.

Mr. President, there is one other feature which was contained in this bill, which no longer appears in it and which has been discussed quite thoroughly; perhaps I may be able to approach it from a slightly different angle. I do not feel contentious about it. I have no pride of opinion. I realize that in discussing it I may lay myself open to the charge that has been made here of obstruction, of lack of patriotism, or of failure to support the administration in the conduct of the war; and yet I do not think there is any Member of the Senate who seriously believes that I am lacking in any degree in a desire to support this Government in this tremendous contest.

We have had to do some pretty revolutionary things in order to make ourselves effective in this war. I was glad to support the selective-draft Army bill, not merely because the administration was in favor of it, but because for many months prior to its establishment I believed that that was the truly democratic method of waging war, and that it was the method by which America could most quickly throw her weight into the scales. I was glad to see it passed. I was glad to see the power of the draft placed in the hands of the President. I did my best to defend that particular piece of legislation upon the floor.

I took the same attitude, sir, with respect to the embargo power. I believe it absolutely essential as a war measure that the Government of the United States be armed with such a power in order that goods from our shores may not reach our enemy. I even voted, sir, for a censorship, because I believed that a censorship properly managed, properly and fairly imposed, is essential to the successful carrying on of this war. I may observe in passing, sir, that in view of the great confusion connected with what might be called our volunteer censorship to-day, it would not have been so bad after all if there had been a legal and official one, properly contrived and properly enforced, under which every publisher and every news association would get exactly the same treatment.

So one measure after another has been passed by Congress, every one of them war measures appropriating literally billions and billions of dollars, and I have done my best to speed them all, and I have given my support to every one.

Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but I am conscious of an atmosphere in this Chamber which, to my mind, is not a healthy one. There is an atmosphere of suspicion, a tendency on the part of men in all walks of life, particularly in the legislative branches of the Government, to speak ill of the men engaged in guiding the destinies of America in the war, to be captious in their criticisms of them, to suspect from time to time that something may be going wrong. It is not a pleasant atmosphere, Mr. President. On more than one occasion it has shown itself upon the floor of the Senate, and there have been distinct outbursts of bitter criticism. Most of them, I am confident, were not based upon facts.

What is the reason, sir, that such an atmosphere may exist in the future as it has existed in the past? It is because the Congress of the United States is in the dark as to how the fourteen or seventeen billion dollars are to be spent or have been spent thus far. People who are in the dark, be they Senators or men out in the wheat fields of Dakota, are bound to become suspicious, and from suspicion they are bound to reach hostility. It may not be an intelligent progress, but it is human and you have got to face it.

Not only is the Congress in the dark with respect to the expenditure of these vast sums, but the public is in the dark. One may go out to-day, sir, and meet groups of citizens discussing the war and the taxes and the appropriations, and one hears scarcely a criticism of the military management of the Army or of the Navy, but one hears the question asked upon every side, How much are these cantonments costing? I do not mean by this, sir, that they are costing too much; I do not know; I am not permitted to know; I have no method of finding out, nor has any other citizen save he finds some official somewhere in some department here who will tell him of his free will.

Mr. President, that is an impossible condition under which to wage war. This must be a people's war; not the war of the Government; not the war of the administration, but a war of the people of the United States, and it can not become truly a war of the people unless the people are admitted into the confidence of the Government with respect to the expenditures.

Surely there can be nothing wrong about it. Surely it can not be contended that such a committee as was proposed by the Senate by a large majority of its membership would handicap the Government in the conduct of this war. I venture to say, sir, that it would help the Government and help it tremendously against that day when further suspicion based undoubtedly upon a false assumption will show its head in this Chamber and be voiced in the press of the country.

Suspicion thrives in darkness. I want to get rid of suspicion. I have upon a former occasion, sir, defended this administration against the suspicions directed against it. I did everything I could to preserve the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, because I was convinced that if the legislation at that time pending before the Senate had been passed it would have deprived America of the best brains within her confines in helping her to wage this war. I do not want another scene similar to the one we had in the discussion of that particular feature of this bill.

I should like to see a connecting link established between the legislative branch and the administrative branch of the Government, so that we can all be able to proceed forward shoulder to shoulder, each understanding the other.

The management of a war, sir, embarked upon for the defense and the preservation of democracy, must not be remote from the people. I believe as these months and years are coming on us, and we may not tell how long this burden shall lie upon our shoulders, our effectiveness will be vastly enhanced if the Congress of the United States is given an opportunity to cooperate with the President and the Army and the Navy in the waging of that war, not in the military sense but in the way of supplying a connecting link through which the public and the Congress shall understand from time to time how the billions and billions of dollars that we are going to take from the pockets of the people are being spent.

Mr. President, both our great allies in a greater or less degree do exactly that same thing. Reference was made here yesterday to the British Parliament and was made again to-day by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], when he said that this very topic had been brought up in the British Commons, and that the leaders of the Government said: "Yes; go ahead; name your committee on expenditures, so that you may know what we are doing with your money from day to day." Remember, Senators, that if such a thing is regarded as wise and proper and necessary in the British Parliament, where the ministry, which corresponds to our Executive, is directly responsible to the Commons itself, surely it would not be unwise to have such a committee in the American Congress, to whom the Government is not responsible in any way.

The same thing is being done in the French Parliament. The French ministry is directly responsible to the Chamber—the Chamber of Deputies. They may be voted out of power overnight. More than one minister in England and in France have in effect been voted out of power for reasons, apparently, which seemed good to those bodies. But the French Parliament have gone farther even than to reserve and to preserve for itself the right of making the ministry responsible to the Chamber. They have established two or three special committees to keep in constant touch with the management of the French Army in the financial sense, with the French Navy in the financial sense, and in one or two other important undertakings of the French Government. Those committees not only have open sessions and receive the accounts and descriptions of the undertakings and achievements of the French ministry and the French Government with respect to the expenditure of funds, but they even have secret sessions. The minister of war may come before that committee of the French Chamber and tell a dozen or twenty members of the French Parliament how the money assigned to him is being expended. It has welded the French Parliament into one body in solid support of the French Government.

Mr. President, I know, of course, that the committee which was provided for in this bill by the Senate by a substantial majority can not be reinserted in the bill at this time. I know the bill will pass in the form of the conference report, but, Mr. President, I hope that the time is not far off when there will be a connecting link between Congress with all its Members, regardless of their former political affiliations, and the President himself and his assistants, all of whom, in my humble judgment, have done exceedingly well thus far in this war, when one considers the degree of unpreparedness in which this country was languishing when the war broke out. They have done exceedingly well, sir. For one I have rejoiced at the general promptness and vigor with which our military preparations have proceeded, but I hope that they, as well as the Members sitting upon the other side of the Chamber will realize that the greatest asset in the waging of a war by a democracy is a thorough understanding between all the branches of the Government and that every degree of publicity which can be safely afforded will be given.

May I call the attention of the Senate in this very matter to a statement issued by the French high commissioner here in Washington three days ago. Monsieur Tardieu sent a letter to Secretary Baker which is printed in the press, telling what France had done in this war, what her resources and manufacturing facilities were at the beginning of the war, and what they are to-day.

He was frank enough to say, sir, that there were nearly 3,000,000 men in the French Army in the war zone; that they had 6,000 pieces of heavy artillery in the field, exclusive of the famous French 75's; that their facilities for turning out the ammunition for the French 75's was so many thousand per day at the outbreak of the war—I think 13,000 shells a day; but that at present the facilities of France have been multiplied and multiplied and multiplied, until they now reach 250,000 shells per day.

Mr. President, it is a healthy thing, now and then, to tell the people how things are progressing.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. May I inquire if M. Tardieu disclosed the reason for this vast increase?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Industrial organization, I think he gave.

Mr. KNOX. I was going to call the Senator's attention, if he has not already read it, to an article in a recent number of the North American Review, a most illuminating article on the increase of the industries in France since the breaking out of the war. It is all because the Government has recognized that which the Senator was contending for a few moments ago—the necessity of encouraging production.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is it—production. I have read the article, and I am glad the Senator from Pennsylvania has called attention to it. If Senators have a moment to read it, they will get from it a comprehension of what the French have done in increasing production since the outbreak of this war. It will be, I believe, a beacon light to guide us in legislation which may come to us in the future.

I called attention to the statement issued by the French high commissioner as an illustration of the value of reasonable publicity. I do not know whether the French people have ever known officially those figures. Perhaps not. But they have them now, and I am exceedingly glad that the American people have been told that France is not exhausted. I am glad that that thought has been dispelled, a thought that has enshrouded our conscience ever since we went into this war, for we have been told that the Republic of France was on its last legs. Now, we have it from a high official representative of the French Government that that is not so, and he tells us just what they have accomplished in three years in the matter of production. He is not afraid, nor is his Government afraid, to tell how many soldiers there are in the French Army fighting the Germans. Why should we be afraid to announce how many American soldiers are in France fighting with the Frenchmen against the Germans? Would it not hearten our people, Mr. President, to know that that force is ever on the increase? What harm could it do? It will not make the German method of warfare any more effective to know from time to time that another contingent of fifteen or twenty thousand American troops has disembarked in France. Certainly we would not tell them when they sailed from America or were about to sail. We would not tell them the name of the ship; we would not tell them the name of the port from which they sailed; we would not tell them the route which they took; but what harm would it do to tell the American people after they have arrived and taken their places in the fighting ranks that they are there? The French have done it. They have taken their people into their confidence. Can not we in a proper manner, with due regard to military necessity, insure this war being a people's war by letting the people know from time to time what is being accomplished, not only how their money is being spent, but what the expenditure of that money has done in strengthening their arms against the common enemy?

Some day, Mr. President, I hope the proper machinery will be installed between the legislative branch and the executive branch which will bring that about. I deeply regret the elimination of that link from this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I submit the following unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] asks unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 8, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the question of agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the bill H. R. 4961, a bill to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think that is necessary except in the case of a final vote on a bill or a resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the rule requires the calling of the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think not. Of course the rule can be stated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is the spirit of the rule, and it ought to be carried out.

Mr. STONE. Let the rule be read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have the rule read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the rule.

The SECRETARY. Paragraph 3, Rule XII, page 14, of the Manual:

No request by a Senator for unanimous consent for the taking of a final vote on a specified date upon the passage of a bill or joint resolution shall be submitted to the Senate for agreement thereto until, upon a roll call ordered for that purpose by the presiding officer, it shall be disclosed that a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum so that there may be no question about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll upon the suggestion of the absence of a quorum by the Senator from Oregon.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	La Follette	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Hitchcock	Lewis	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Hollis	McKellar	Smoot
Chamberlain	Husting	Martin	Sterling
Cummins	James	Myers	Stone
Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sutherland
Fernald	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Pittman	Vardaman
France	Kenyon	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Gore	King	Pomerene	Warren
Gronna	Kirby	Saulsbury
Harding	Knox	Sheppard

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was called out of the Chamber only a few moments ago and is absent by necessity.

I also desire to announce the absence on official business of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. MCNARY, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. WEEKS, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. WOLCOTT answered to their names when called.

Mr. BECKHAM, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] asks unanimous consent for the adoption of the unanimous-consent agreement, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, August 8, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the question of agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the bill H. R. 4961, a bill to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon, Is there any reason why we can not vote on this conference report now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is no reason except——

Mr. KNOX. Then why not vote now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to suggest there are one or two Senators desirous of making short statements upon the subject who could not be here this evening, and I did not like to preclude them if they desired to speak to the conference report.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if he had just as soon fix the hour for voting at 4 o'clock instead of 3? There is at least one Senator whom I doubt can reach here before 3 o'clock or half past 3 to-morrow, who would like to be present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should have no objection to that change in the agreement, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the unanimous-consent agreement will be so modified. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, what time does the proposed agreement fix for taking the vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As modified, it is proposed to vote on the conference report at 4 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not know that I shall object to this request for unanimous consent, but, if I do not, my only reason for not doing so will be because I am afraid that if the bill goes back to conference it will come out in worse shape than it now is. I am afraid that the conferees might find some wrong left undone, and, if we send it back to conference, that the bill would be returned to us in a still more obnoxious shape. For that reason I am very much inclined to agree to the request asked for by my friend from Oregon. The bill is about as bad as it could be, according to my conception, and I should like to see it gotten rid of, so that we might proceed to something more wholesome.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon as modified? There being none, the agreement is unanimously entered into.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on August 3, 1917, approved and signed the following act:

A bill and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 89) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to expend funds in New Mexico and Texas for drainage purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I understand it is desired that a short executive session shall be held this afternoon, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Tuesday, August 7, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 7, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, we thank Thee for our country with its vast resources, its sacred institutions, its splendid opportunities for intellectual, moral, and spiritual attainments. Help us to measure up to the trust reposed in us as American citizens. "To whom much has been given, of him much shall be required."

A mighty task has been thrust upon us; grant that we may meet it like men, with patriotic zeal and fervor, that we may join our forces to the millions now engaged in a death struggle for the principles dear to our hearts, that right may prevail and war sink to rise no more forever, that brotherly love may have the ascendancy in the hearts of all the peoples of all the world under the spiritual leadership of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the procedings of Saturday was read and approved.

INTER-ALLIED PARLIAMENT (H. DOC. NO. 326).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the French ambassador.

The communication was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 6, 1917.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have received, with a request to convey it to you, a telegram from Mr. Franklin Bouillon, member of our Chamber of Deputies and vice president of the Inter-Allied Parliament, announcing his arrival here in the near future, being the bearer of an invitation to the American Congress on behalf of the British, Italian, and French sections of the Inter-Allied Parliament.

Commending this dispatch to your kind consideration, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy, and I beg you to believe me, dear Mr. Speaker,

Very sincerely, yours, JUSSERAND.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

PARIS, August 5, 1917.

To Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives:

Parliament having adjourned, I am leaving next week to carry to American Parliament invitation of British, Italian, and French sections of Inter-Allied Parliament. I very much regret that my voyage has been unavoidably delayed owing to my duties in Parliament and feel much honored that I am now able to fulfill my mission. I hear that Representative MCCORMICK intends leaving for Europe. Might I suggest that he kindly await my arrival, if this is convenient, as he will find nobody now in parliamentary circles in France or in Italy, all members having dispersed in consequence of recess, and English Parliament may adjourn shortly. It would give me great pleasure to work with him when I arrive in Washington and I believe it would hasten our cooperation.

In the name of my colleagues I wish to tender you the expression of our sincere respect, heartfelt sympathy, and our earnest desire to bind closer the Parliaments of our countries.

HENRY FRANKLIN, Deputé,
Vice President Inter-Allied Parliament.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 1816. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes; and

S. 2356. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2688. An act to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City, Mo., authorized by an act approved June 17, 1914; and

S. 2360. An act to incorporate the American Academy of Engineers.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1816. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes; and

S. 2356. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on August 6, 1917, they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 4285. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman object to stating upon what subject?

Mr. GREGG. No; it is on the question of the cost of the production of steel and steel plate—some figures I have gotten up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, is that request in order under the agreement made for adjournments?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair does not think it is, but it has already been done.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the Member from Texas if it has any relation to this ship controversy?

Mr. GREGG. No, sir; it has not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I was not here when the agreement was made, but my understanding was the agreement contemplated no business should be transacted.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the agreement did contemplate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. For the present I object because it would open up, I believe, a flood of requests——

Mr. GREGG. I will say to the gentleman I have not consumed any time of this Congress in debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I realize that, and as I understand no objection was made in the beginning I do not object to the gentleman extending his remarks but I will from this time on object to the extension of remarks pending this agreement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand the agreement to do no business goes so far as to prevent a Member from asking unanimous consent to speak or to extend remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As I read the agreement that is the way I interpret it, and it seems that interpretation is sustained by the opinion of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that this whole matter was thoroughly thrashed out here about three weeks ago. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] elucidated the subject and several gentlemen joined in with him, and it was tacitly agreed at that time that it did cut out unanimous-consent requests to extend remarks, and the Chair will not recognize anybody else for that purpose and the only reason he recognized the gentleman from Texas was on account of its peculiar condition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask another question, please? I am not perfectly clear yet on one point. Does it contemplate merely the prevention of extension of remarks, or does it prohibit by unanimous consent the making of a speech?

The SPEAKER. Why, the agreement was, after Mr. COOPER raised the question—and it was wrangled over for 10 minutes or so—that it contemplated cutting out the extension of remarks, speeches delivered on the floor, and everything else except business from the Speaker's table and the reading and adoption of the Journal, and the question was then raised whether you could swear in a Member, and the Chair said that no agreement could cut out his right to be sworn in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think if the gentleman from Texas will look at the first page of the calendar this morning, where the agreement is printed in full, he will find that it is the understanding that no business shall be transacted after the reading and approval of the Journal.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to submit a few observations on the right of small nations to live, a question we are all professing to be interested in and a view from which, I think, nobody dissents.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair attempted to state what the agreement was, and the Chair did state it. Is there objection to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] extending his remarks? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Several speeches are provided for to-day: The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], 30 minutes; the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN], 30 minutes; the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], 30 minutes; and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], 15 minutes. The reason why the Chair makes this statement is that the gentleman from Mississippi agreed to yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and the lady from Montana has agreed to yield six minutes to him, and he wants to put the two contributions together so that he could speak for nine minutes after the lady from Montana has finished her remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How can gentlemen who have obtained time handy it about? Have they the right to parcel that time out?

The SPEAKER. Well, that has been the uniform practice of the House, except under the five-minute rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thought that the agreement that was had between the two sides was that no point of no quorum would be made.

The SPEAKER. No; that was not in the agreement.

Mr. HEFLIN. Except when business was undertaken to be transacted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand.

Mr. HEFLIN. My understanding was that no Member would make the point of no quorum unless it was intended to transact business.

The SPEAKER. No. There was not any agreement of that sort made. That was not a part of the agreement.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. Was not the unanimous-consent agreement that these Members should have the right to speak at this time to-day? It is in violation of that agreement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but that does not preclude the point of making the point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington withdraws it.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal requests, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TUESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1917.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The Naval Affairs Committee are to make a tour of inspection, lasting probably three weeks. As a member of that committee, I ask a leave of absence during that period to attend to the duties of inspection.

Cordially,

F. C. HICKS.

AUGUST 7, 1917.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I respectfully ask for indefinite leave of absence, on account of illness of my mother.

C. H. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER. Without objection these requests will be granted.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of a short resolution passed by the House of Representatives of the State of Texas, which I want to present to this House.

The SPEAKER. That is against the agreement. The only thing in order is the recognition of these people to make speeches.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand that this agreement contemplates that no further permission to speak will be granted by the House until the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] indicates that we are ready to resume business?

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what it means. It is demonstrated by the fact that somebody else wanted to get leave to make speeches.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may not get into a further tangle, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] shall address the House for 30 minutes.

THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, upon the beginning of the great European war the United States immediately assumed a position of strict neutrality. The proclamation of President Wilson to this effect was expected, and it at once met with the universal approval of the American people.

The Monroe doctrine guaranteeing the territorial sovereignty of our sister Republics in South and Central America from foreign aggression, always a principle of the utmost importance to all countries in the western continent, had recently, by way of emphasis, been reaffirmed by the United States both in 1899 and 1907 at The Hague Conventions.

Next in importance to the Monroe doctrine has been that principle, first laid down by Washington and universally practiced by his successors, whenever it was possible so to do, of avoiding all embarrassing and entangling alliances, or mixing in the quarrels of our European neighbors. For us to intervene in a European quarrel would be an invitation to them to violate both the letter and the spirit of the Monroe doctrine.

It was in accordance with this time-honored principle, as well as an earnest desire that our country be spared the horrors of war which postponed for many days the inevitable conflict with Germany, and it was only after repeatedly submitting to many outrages that the United States reluctantly entered the war. [Applause.]

To have delayed longer would not only have placed our country in a humilitating attitude before all the world, but would have also meant the surrender of those inalienable rights and privileges which from time immemorial have been guaranteed to every country by the laws of nations. Such a surrender would have caused the United States to lose its prestige among the countries of the earth and inevitably sink to the level of a second or third rate power.

Much has been written about the causes which led to the great struggle now convulsing all Christendom, and both the entente and the central powers try to lay the blame upon the other. But truth, ever faithful to her trust, is mighty, and even though crushed to earth in the end it will prevail, and when the real facts in regard to this war will be known, the future historian will charge this great crime against Christianity and civilization to the Imperial German Empire.

At the present time much is conjecture. Some of the evidence against Germany is direct, some circumstantial, but conjecture, history, and tradition of the Fatherland, evidence circumstantial and evidence direct, all together, like so many interlocking links in a chain, make an indictment against the Imperial German Government from which it can never escape.

The cowardly and abominable assassination of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand and his wife, the Duchess of Hohenburg, by the young student Gabrillo Princip, on June 28, 1914, in the streets of Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia, was no more the cause of this war than was the munition maker who made the gun from which the deadly missile came which sank the Lusitania the cause of the destruction of that great vessel. The assassination of the heir to the Austrian throne was the fuse which fired the cannon loaded, primed, and trained upon the enemy. It was a pretext eagerly seized by Austria to humiliate Serbia. There was much antagonism and hatred between the two countries. Each feared the other. Serbia was the stumbling-block in Austria's plans for Balkan control. Austria had already seized part of the Balkan territory by annexing, in 1908, Bosnia and Herzegovina. Through the Balkan Peninsula was the only route by which Germany could extend its operations in the East and secure an outlet on the Adriatic, Ægean, and Mediterranean Seas. It was the only way Germany could reach the important seaport of Saloniki in the domain of his brother-in-law, the King of Greece. A railroad from Berlin to Bagdad would have shortened the distance to India by 10 days. It would have been of incalculable benefit to Germany in a commercial way. It would in case of war have placed Germany in close proximity to the Suez Canal, and Egypt could have been attacked from the land side. This railroad was a cherished plan of the German Kaiser.

Despite the Armenian and other inhuman atrocities, Germany had for some time been making friendly overtures to the Turk, and, as after events showed by which Turkey entered the war as an ally of the central powers, these overtures were received with much favor by the Ottoman Empire. It is strange that these overtures should have been so enthusiastically received, for German aggression in Asia and Africa through Turkish territory would be in every way inimical to the best interests of the Turkish Empire. However that may be, Germany had firmly established a friendly footing with the Ottoman Government. The benefits to be derived by Germany were great, and it was essential that Austria, Germany's ally, should have a free hand in the Balkans as the first step in Germany's campaign for both military and commercial supremacy in the East.

The Balkan Peninsula was the scene of much strife and turmoil, and the different Balkan States were frequently fighting among themselves. That much of this turmoil and fighting was the result of Austrian diplomacy there can be little doubt. There was, for a while, intense rivalry between Serbia and Bulgaria for supremacy in the Balkans, but Serbia had in recent wars completely demonstrated that the title to supremacy in Balkan affairs was hers. Serbia, dismembered, would have removed the chief obstacle to Austria's control in the peninsula and at the same time would put an end to the Serbian propaganda of hate which was the cause of much disquiet and unrest in the Slavonic Provinces of the dual monarchy. Over 40 per cent of the Austrian population was Slavonic. Many of these Slavs were ripe for revolt, and a confederated Balkan Peninsula was the least desirable of all things to Austria. In this Austria had a firm ally in Germany and as the former country was completely under German control and dominated by German interests, as long as Austria held a firm hand in Balkan affairs the German Kaiser's dream of a railroad from Berlin to Bagdad held the promise of its fulfillment.

Of all the Balkan States Serbia was the most important. Though a small power, yet Serbia also had dreams of conquest. She had already shown military ability of the highest order. The blood of her people being almost purely Slavonic, there was a strong affinity between Serbia and the Russian Empire. Unquestionably historical, cultural, military, and racial right to supremacy in the Balkans belonged to Serbia. She was bound by ties of blood and interest to Montenegro, the only Balkan State which never surrendered to the Turk. A footing upon either the Adriatic or Ægean Seas would in a short time develop Serbia into a great commercial nation and would mean the emancipation of all the southern Balkan territory from Turkey. The dream of Serbia was a united Slavonic Balkan confederacy with Serbia occupying practically the same position in this confederacy that Prussia occupied in the German confederation. It is doubtful whether this could ever have been accomplished. Certainly, however, no other Balkan State was capable of bringing about this confederation. Always in dread of Austrian encroachment an intense hatred sprang up between the two countries, which was intensified on the one hand by the activity of secret societies supposed to be backed by the Government of Serbia intriguing and spreading dissatisfaction among the Austrian Slavonic Provinces and on the other by the annexation by Austria of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the fear of further encroachment.

The Bosnians and the Herzegovinians resembled their Serbian neighbors in thought, in racial characteristics, and in appearance. They have the same race pride, the same love of country, of poetry, of music, and of romance. They have the same superstition, the same customs, and speak the same language as the Serbians. Up to 1878 Bosnia and Herzegovina were nominally Turkish Provinces and had repeatedly attempted to throw off the Turkish yoke. At the completion of the Turko-Russo War, by the terms of the treaty of Berlin, Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the consent of the other powers, were transferred to their powerful neighbors on the north, with the distinct understanding that when order and tranquillity had been restored Austria would withdraw and permit them to become independent States. But in 1908, Austria, with the approval of Germany, and taking advantage of Russia's weakened and demoralized condition after the Japanese War, and the domestic troubles then convulsing Great Britain, repudiated the treaty of Berlin and annexed both Bosnia and Herzegovina. Russia, Great Britain, and other powers at once entered vigorous protests, which were met with an emphatic declaration from Germany that Austria's aggression in Balkan territory would brook no interference. It was made plain by the Imperial German Government that in Balkan matters the cause of Austria was also the cause of Germany. The other powers submitted, but this annexation aroused great excitement and intense resentment in Serbia. For so closely did the Bosnians and the Herzegovinians resemble the Serbs that Serbia felt as though part of her own territory had been seized by Austria. The natives of the annexed Provinces, already intensely antagonistic to Austria, were also much incensed by the high-handed way in which Austria had repudiated the treaty of Berlin and annexed them without their will or consent. This act of Austria was the cause of the Serbians increasing the propaganda of hate and dissatisfaction which had been industriously spread in all the Balkan territory under Austrian control.

A confederation or political alliance of the Balkan Peninsula would have united, roughly speaking, a territory of about 237,000 square miles, with a population of over 27,000,000. This, however, would include Greece, with about 25,000 square miles and a population of about two and a half millions. It would also include what is left of the Turkish dominion in Europe. This federation or alliance of over 27,000,000, with Serbia the dominant and commanding power, would not only have so commanded the respect of Russia and the other powers that it would have been a decided check to the ambitious plans of dominion for Germany but, what was far more important to Austria, it would have been a source of constant anxiety for fear the Slavs in Austria, already discontented and ripe for revolt, would, relying on the power of the federation, be continually tempted to revolt and throw off the Austrian yoke. Bosnia and Herzegovinia, with a population of over 2,000,000, Dalmatia, with over 700,000, and Croatia-Slavonia, with over 1,200,000, were eagerly waiting an opportunity to rebel, while in the north Bohemia, the richest part of all Austria-Hungary, with its 6,500,000 people, were eagerly awaiting any kind of an opportunity to throw off the Austrian rule.

The Serbians were keenly aware of the importance both to Austria and Germany that Serbia should be destroyed. Once

Serbia was dismembered and partitioned among the greedy Balkan States, the central powers had little to fear, as only the genius and the primacy of Serbia could effect any kind of confederation or organization in the Balkans.

Knowing this, the Serbians on several occasions, in order to avoid a conflict which, unaided, would have meant their ruin, submitted to much humiliation. That Russia was also keenly alive to this situation is shown by the instant mobilization of her troops upon the Austrian and Serbian frontiers immediately after the ultimatum was sent to Serbia.

That France knew the extent of the German plan for world-wide control can not be doubted. Germany's attitude on many occasions, especially during the Moroccan embroglio, even going so far as to send a gunboat to Algiers, put France on notice. England alone appeared to be singularly blind to the extent of Germany's schemes of world aggrandizement. This is partly explained on the theory that England had for so many years regarded Russia as its hereditary enemy that the plans of Germany, a much more formidable power, were overlooked. The ceding by England of the island of Helgoland to Germany in exchange for a free hand in Zanzibar will ever be regarded as one of the colossal blunders of history, though, strange to say, this treaty, while unfavorably regarded in England, was even more unpopular in Germany. But German diplomacy knew the strategic importance of this island. It was at once strongly fortified, and protects the mouth of the Kiel Canal, giving Germany two outlets to her fleet, each adequately protected and in case of attack, forcing England to divide her fleet. So important did the German Kaiser regard this island that he immediately went to the expense of doubling the width and extending the depth of the Kiel Canal so as to allow easy passage of the largest superdreadnaught.

It is strange that the tremendous naval program of Germany did not put England on notice. So vast were these naval appropriations that up to 1907 Germany was spending $73 where England was spending $23. England, finally becoming alarmed at the rapid growth and development of the German Navy, proposed an agreement whereby each country would curtail the burdens of naval expenditure. This proposition was declined, and then England kept pace with Germany in naval preparation. At about the same time France became alarmed at the enormous preparations going on in Germany in reference to the huge land force and heavy armaments, and entered a protest, which was of no avail.

That the intention of Germany was to dominate the European powers and seize such of the colonial possessions of these powers as best suited her pleasure, while difficult to prove, yet it may well be believed. German thought and German kultur was obsessed with the idea that it was the mission of the German Empire to impress its peculiar form of civilization upon the rest of the world. The Kaiser himself and the strong writers of Germany, while closely adhering to the doctrine that might makes right, seemed to think that Germany had been chosen by God to rule over and reorganize, as it were, the rest of mankind. So vast has been their military preparations, so long has this idea obsessed the minds of Germany's best thinkers, and so ready and eager were they for the conflict, that there can be little doubt but that the Hohenzollern Kaiser thought the time was ripe, the occasion propitious, to test his wonderful war machine and put this gigantic plan into execution.

Since the days when by the ability and shrewdness of the Great Elector his son Frederick became the first King of Prussia, the Hohenzollerns have been the incarnate spirit, the very embodiment of military preparation, and the most conspicuous example of military and arbitrary force of any nation in the world. With the Hohenzollerns greed for territory has been a mania. They held what they once acquired and immediately began to Prussianize the territory often acquired with the merest shadow of right, and the Prussian manners, customs, and military spirit was at once so indelibly impressed upon the new territory that in time it partook of the characteristics of the old. By steadfastly and inexorably pursuing this policy the small State of Brandenburg, with only 15,000 square miles and a population of only about 4,000,000 people, from the latter part of the fifteenth century, has developed into the mighty German Empire of to-day, ruled over by a Hohenzollern Kaiser, who, notwithstanding over a million and a half of his best men have been slain on the battle fields of Europe and nearly all of Christendom is arrayed against him, still dreams of German kultur dominating the rest of the world.

Brandenburg in the seventeenth century acquired Pomerania, with over 1,700,000 inhabitants, East Prussia, with a population of over 2,000,000, and the towns of Halle, Magdeberg, Hallestadt, Ruzberger, Rippin, and Linden, and all of this territory soon absorbed the Hohenzollern ideas of military force. The eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, up to 1870, saw a great development and growth of Prussia. There was acquired West Prussia, with over 2,000,000 inhabitants; Silesia, with over 5,000,000; Posen, with 2,000,000 inhabitants; the Province of the Rhine, with over 7,000,000; Westphalia, with over 4,000,000; the rest of Pomerania; a great slice of Hanover, and numberless cities and towns. This was the Kingdom of Prussia which in 1866, completely and decisively defeating Austria, eagerly welcomed the foolish blunders of Napoleon III, and in a few months overran France and seized all of Alsace and a great part of Lorraine. The easy victories over Austria and France so increased the prestige of the Kingdom of Prussia that it was comparatively easy for Bismarck to persuade the rest of Germany to come into a federation with Prussia at the head and form the German Empire.

When the Crown Prince of Austria and his wife were assassinated, there was great excitement in Austria and intense feeling against Serbia arose. It was contended by the Austrians that the plot to assassinate the Crown Prince was carefully laid in Belgrade and that the Serbian Government was directly responsible for the abominable crime. This charge stirred Europe to its very foundations. France and Russia had entered into an alliance called the dual alliance. Germany, Austria, and Italy had also entered into an alliance. The relations between Russia and Serbia were close, bound together by ties of blood, kindred, and interest. The Serbians more resembled the Russian Slavs than any other Balkan State. Austrian domination of the Balkans opened the door to all the Kaiser's dreams of conquest in Africa and Asia. Hence Europe was much disturbed over the assassination at Sarajevo.

After several weeks had elapsed and men's minds had cooled, it seemed to be generally understood that while Austria would make demands on Serbia in the nature of an ultimatum, yet these demands would be such that Serbia could comply, and Europe breathed again. It seems that Count Berchtold, the Austro-Hungarian Premier, had assured the Russian Ambassador that no extraordinary demands would be made upon Serbia and the ambassador was absent on a brief vacation when the ultimatum was sent. The ultimatum sent to Serbia was such that no nation could submit and retain its sovereignty. The ultimatum was evidently one Austria did not believe Serbia could accept, nor want Serbia to accept. It required that Serbia should repress every publication that intended to reflect upon Austria; to dissolve all the anti-Austro-Hungarian societies; to eliminate without delay all instructors and all educational matter which might serve to foment a propaganda against Austro-Hungary; and remove all officials from military and administrative service guilty of such propaganda, the names of which would be submitted by Austria later; to accept the collaboration of Austrian representatives to help enforce these demands; to permit Austrians to sit as a court in Serbia and participate in the judicial inquiry against the accessories to the plot to assassinate the Crown Prince and his wife; to arrest certain personages whose names were set forth in the ultimatum; to make public apology for the utterances of Serbian high officials, both at home and abroad, who after the crime of the 28th of June did not hesitate to express themselves in terms of hostility toward the Austro-Hungarian monarchy; and to inform the Imperial Government without delay of the carrying out of these measures. An answer was demanded in 48 hours.

Never was a more humiliating or insulting document sent from one civilized country to another. It was not expected that Serbia could comply with these demands.

It is contended by some that Germany had knowledge of this ultimatum before it was sent to Serbia. That Germany approved the ultimatum can not be questioned; also that Germany was opposed to a further extension of the 48-hour limit seems to be well established. Briggs Davenport, in his interesting history of the great war, which shows a remarkable familiarity with Balkan affairs, tells us that the text of the ultimatum was telegraphed to the Kaiser, who amended it in some particulars "in the direction of greater severity, so that the chance of evasion on the part of Serbia was minimized. It was he who fixed at 48 hours the limit of time for the response." However this may be, Germany refused to join in with Russia, England, and France requesting Austria to grant Serbia more time. The British ambassador telegraphed to Sir Edward Grey that "although I am not able to verify it, I have private information that the German ambassador knew the text of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia before it was dispatched, and telegraphed it to the German Emperor. I know from the German ambassador himself that he indorsed every line of it." Both the Russian ambassador and the Belgian minister at London on the 28th day of July expressed the opinion that Austria would never have sent such an ultimatum to Serbia without first showing it to Germany and having some agreement with that country. The note to Serbia was dispatched at an unfortunate time in so far as it concerned the powers who tried to preserve peace. The Russian ambassador had left Vienna on a brief vacation; the Serbian prime minister, Pachitsh, was absent from Belgrade; President Poincare, of France, and Réné Viviani, head of the ministry, were on the road returning from a visit to the Czar. The Kaiser was away from Berlin and could not be located for some time.

Serbia complied with practically all of the Austrian demands save that one which permitted Austrians to sit as a court in Serbia. Austria then invaded Serbia. Russia then declared war against Austria. On August 1 Germany declared war against Russia. On August 2 Germany sent an ultimatum demanding a right of way through Belgium into France, the day before war was declared against France. Belgium refused. The next day, August 3, Germany declared war against France because some French aeroplanes had flown over the border, and began to advance on France through Belgium. On August 4 Germany declared war on Belgium. Great Britain, Prussia, France, and Russia had jointly signed a document afterwards referred to by the German chancellor as "a scrap of paper" guaranteeing to preserve the neutrality of Belgium. The Fifth Hague Convention declared, in article 1, "that the territory of neutral powers is inviolable," and, in article 2, that "belligerents are forbidden to move across the territory of a neutral power troops or convoys, either of munitions of war or supplies," and, in article 5, that "a neutral power ought not to allow on its territory any of the acts referred to in articles 2 and 4."

When Great Britain saw that the neutrality of Belgium was disregarded, England then declared war on Germany. The German troops attacked Liege, and the greatest war in the history of the world had begun.

That Germany had dreams of world-wide dominion and control seems to be firmly fixed in the minds of many of the best thinkers here and abroad. Some think that primarily this control meant supremacy only in commercial affairs; there are others who believe Germany was after territory both in Europe and the East; but all are agreed that Prussian militarism was prepared to extend German commerce by the sword rather than by diplomacy and treaty. Arrogance, conceit, and intolerance mark the utterances of the Kaiser and Germany's most intellectual men, and give color to the obsession that Germany seems to have that it possesses some sort of a divine right to rule over the rest of mankind. They seem to think that Germany is so far superior to other countries in morals, in culture, in education, in the sciences and the arts, and in every other way that it is the mission of that country to exercise a protectorate over the universe and forcibly extend to less favored nations the inestimable blessings of German kultur.

I do not want to do the German people an injustice. Many of my warmest and best friends are descendants, direct descendants, of Germans, noble, high-minded, God-fearing, generous-hearted men and women. As Edmund Burke once said, "I do not know how to bring an indictment against a whole people," and I can never believe that the great masses of the German people are inspired by German kultur.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] in his excellent speech several weeks ago stated that—

> The cultured individual German, as we know him, is a student, a reader, a thinker, a lover of art, a man of high ideals. The average individual German, as we know him, is industrious, methodical, honest, and loyal to his adopted flag. These men and women came here to escape militarism; they came here to escape the iron walls of caste; they came here because our flag means widened opportunity.

I think that view is generally accepted of the characteristics of the German people and their descendants here in America. It is the system of Prussian militarism, the teachings of Prussian kultur which has made Germany to-day an international outlaw and an outcast among all the civilized nations of the world.

President Wilson, in his address to Congress on the 2d day of last April, has perhaps better than anyone else expressed our real feelings toward the German people. He said:

> We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon as wars used to be determined upon in the old, unhappy days, when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or of little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools. Self-governed nations do not fill their neighbor States with spies or set the course of intrigue to bring about some critical posture of affairs which will give them an opportunity to strike and make conquest. Such designs can be successfully worked out only under cover and where no one has the right to ask questions. Cunningly contrived plans of deception or aggression, carried, it may be, from generation to generation, can be worked out and kept from the light only within the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class. They are happily impossible where public opinion commands and insists upon full information concerning all the nations' affairs.

The greatest and most intellectual writers and thinkers of Germany clamor for world dominion. In 1913 an official German report reads in part:

> Neither ridiculous shriekings for revenge by French chauvinists, nor the Englishman's gnashing of teeth, nor the wild gestures of the Slav will turn us from our aim of protecting and extending German influence all the world over. It is our sacred duty to sharpen the sword that has been put into our hands and to hold it ready for defense as well as for offense * * *. We must accustom them (our people) to think that an offensive war on our part is a necessity * * *. We must stir up troubles in the north of Africa and in Russia. In the next European war it will also be necessary that the small States shall be forced to follow us or be subdued. In certain conditions their armies and their fortified places can be rapidly conquered or neutralized; this would probably be the case with Belgium and Holland.

This in 1913 when Germany in 1907 subscribed to the doctrine that the territory of a neutral power is inviolable, and that—

> Belligerents are forbidden to move across the territory of a neutral power troops or convoys, either of munitions of war or supplies.

And also in view of the fact that Germany, England, Russia, and France had guaranteed to respect the integrity and maintain the neutrality of Belgium.

This report well accords with Bismarck's utterance:

> When the power of Prussia is concerned I know no law.

Several years before the war the Pan Germanic League published a manifesto under the name of Universal Empire. It declared:

> Progressive effort will be carried on until our batteries can be unmasked without danger. Europe will then find herself confronted by a situation already prepared, even to the minutest details, and against which she will be powerless.

The Kaiser said:

> The sea is our empire; the trident is ours to wield.

German world-wide dominion was taught in the schools. Prof. von Seyden declared in the Frankfurter Zeitung:

> Germany should and wishes to be let alone. The Germans are the elect people of the earth. They will accomplish their destiny, which is to govern the world and to direct the other nations for the welfare of humanity.

Maximilian Hardin, in Die Zukunft, said:

> After all it is visibly the meaning of history that the white race, under the leadership of the Germans, shall arrive at the real and ultimate domination of the world.

Prof. Schmoller, a German publicist of great authority, is quoted as writing:

> We must wish that at any price a German country peopled by twenty to thirty million Germans may grow up in southern Brazil.

Such teachings by the most intellectual men in Germany, after nearly 50 years of gigantic military preparation, coupled with a sincere belief in the minds of many that the German people were the chosen instrument of God to reform and chastise the world, might well cause apprehension to the other powers. Nor was this apprehension allayed when men like Haeckel taught—> that force takes priority over right.

When Clausman stated:

> All idea of philanthropy in war is a pernicious error.

When the Kaiser said:

> Nothing must henceforth be settled in this world without the intervention by Germany and the German Empire.

To which Treitschke, one of the greatest of all modern German writers, added:

> To whom shall belong the scepter of the universe.

And who also taught that power and expediency were the sole criterions of right.

And that—> war is the only remedy for ailing nations.

And also—> that the living God will see to it that war constantly recurs as a dreadful medicine for the human race.

When the great Gen. von Moltke said:

> War is an ordinance set by God.

Treitschke again said:

> We have learned to know the moral majesty of war in the very thing that to superficial observers appears brutal and inhuman.

Upon such reasoning was undoubtedly justified the inhuman cruelties in Belgium. Bernhardi, another great German writer, speaks of the "sanctity of war" and called it a—> divine institution more noble than dispensing justice; that a State can not commit a crime and that its highest duty is to increase its power; that between one State and another there can be no law; that a war of conquest is as legitimate as a defensive war; and that the maintenance of peace ought never to be a political aim.

And again:

The efforts directed toward the abolition of war must not only be termed foolish but absolutely immoral and must be described as unworthy of the human race.

That war was "the force which propagated the finest flower of civilization" and was "the only efficient school of heroism."

And yet this bloodthirsty, war-crazed individual was one of the greatest intellects in all Europe and wielded a powerful influence in molding the minds of the German people.

The learned Prof. Eucken, of the faculty of Jena, taught that—to us more than any other nation is intrusted the true structure of human existence.

Von Buelow, the imperial chancellor, says:

We Germans are the most learned people of the earth and at the same time the most capable in war * * * the military and the intellectual deeds of the Germans are unequaled.

The chiefs of the intellectuals declared:

The German people are the elect of God and their enemies are His enemies.

It is astonishing how so many intellectual people could get the idea that they hold a commission from God to regulate the universe. Said the Kaiser:

We Hohenzollerns take our crown from God alone, and to God alone are we responsible.

He contends that he is the vicegerent of God; that he is His sword and His weapon. He declares that upon him the spirit of God has descended, and he threatens with death all who disbelieve. As a boy he is said to have written on his photograph, presented to a friend:

Let them hate if but they fear.

He once stated to his soldiers, as they started to put down the Boxer rebellion:

Remember that when you meet the foe that no quarter will be given and that no prisoners will be taken.

Again he is reported as saying to his troops:

You are my soldiers. You have given yourself to me body and soul. If I were to ask you to fire on your own brothers or your parents, or to put them to the sword, remember your oath.

He solemnly announced that—the world will one day be made whole through the efficacy of the German character.

No wonder the powers of Europe were apprehensive when they listened to such teachings. German kultur teaches that they are morally superior to the other peoples of the world. How have they shown their kultur? How have they proved their morals? Admiral von Tirpitz declared two years ago that the allies' ships should be sunk without warning, and, according to newspaper reports, one German officer, high in rank, recently declared:

It were much better that all on board perished, as it would strike terror to the hearts of the enemies of Germany.

What does German kultur mean? What does German kultur stand for? If a tenth part of the reports we have received are true, it means soldiers going into guiltless, unhappy, defenseless Belgium and committing outrages which would have brought the blush of shame to the face of an aboriginal untutored savage. It means the wholesale violation of young girls before their anguished parents' eyes. It means holding up a white flag and firing on the unsuspecting soldiers as they approached. It means the slaughter of defenseless men, the bayoneting of little children, and the murder of gentlewomen. It means dropping bombs upon sleeping cities where women and children were torn and mangled beyond all recognition. It means the burning and destruction of Red Cross hospitals. It means deporting the men to work in the fields of Germany, leaving the wives and little ones at home to starve. It means cutting off the breasts of women and the hands of boys and girls. It means using helpless men, women, and children as human screens, forcing them to go before the German attack to be shot down by their friends. It means stealthily, silently creeping up on an unsuspecting passenger vessel and sending it to the bottom of the sea, and as the men, women, and children flounder, half strangled, drowning in the water, German kultur means that German bullets shall complete the work the torpedo started.

Yet Dr. Adolph Lassen, privy counselor to the Kaiser, is said to have written:

We are morally and intellectually superior to all others; without equals. * * * We have no friends. All fear us and all look upon us as dangerous, because we are intelligent and active and morally superior to all.

Gen. von Disfurth was nearer correct when he stated in a published interview:

Germany stands as the supreme arbiter of her own methods, which in time of war the world must be compelled to accept. * * * For my part, I hope that we have merited in this war the title of barbarians.

There can be no doubt that all Christendom will admit that Gen. Disfurth's fondest hope has been realized. Gen. Hartman said:

When the national war breaks forth terrorism becomes a necessary military principle. * * * The fighter has need of passion. * * * Violence and passion, these are the two principal levers in every act of war, and, let us say it fearlessly, of all warlike grandeur.

Erzberger, a leader of the conservative party in the Reichstag, who now is clamoring for peace, is quoted as saying:

This war ought to be as pitiless as possible.

Henrich Heine, born in Prussia, wrote that Christianity itself could not destroy "the brutal German joy of battle."

Marshal von Haesseler was quoted as saying:

If a people have the right of dominion, its power of conquest constitutes the highest moral law, and before it the vanquished must bow.

The murder of Capt. Fryatt and Miss Edith Cavell must have been justified by this law. Capt. Fryatt, who commanded a British merchant steamer, was in March, 1916, attacked by a submarine without warning. He attempted to ram the submarine and forced it to submerge, thus saving his vessel from destruction and himself and crew from probable death. About three months afterwards, while piloting a passenger vessel with a number of unfortunate Belgian refugees aboard, he was captured by German torpedo boats and taken to Bruges and tried by court-martial for attempting to destroy a German submarine several months before. A generous enemy applauds a brave act, a heroic deed, even if committed by a foe. But German kultur, so superior to the morals of the rest of the world, demanded the blood of this man, who, in order to save the lives of himself and crew, dared to resist the murderous attack of a German submarine. He was sentenced to death and immediately executed.

A Dutch paper called this crime "a dastardly murder of spite and hatred."

This superior kultur was well illustrated in the murder of Miss Edith Cavell, an English nurse, who had in the hospitals nursed back to life again scores of wounded German soldiers. She assisted some wounded English and Belgian prisoners to escape. For this she was tried by a secret court-martial and sentenced to be executed. The American minister tried in every way in his power to save the life of this noble woman, whose gentle ministrations among the sick and wounded knew no distinctions of country, but to no avail. She was taken to the place of execution and faced the firing squad. It is said that when this young woman faced that firing squad that, hardened soldiers as they were, their hearts were touched with compassion. The order was given to fire, and when the smoke cleared away it was found that she was only slightly wounded, one bullet alone having touched her. But German kultur needed this sacrifice to carry out its high ideals, and the officer in charge of the execution, drawing his pistol, advanced upon the unfortunate woman and shot her through the head. About the same time across the English Channel a German woman, a detected and self-confessed spy, who fearlessly and defiantly admitted her guilt and gloried in her deeds, was tried by an English court-martial. She was also convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in an English jail; yet the English woman, who had a hundred times risked her life in nursing back to health scores of sick and wounded German soldiers, was shot down like a dog.

Baron von Bissing is said to have remarked—

When thousands of innocent people have died in the war, why should anyone become hysterical over the death of one guilty woman?

An English committee, with Hon. Viscount Bryce, former ambassador to the United States, as chairman, was appointed to take testimony and investigate the alleged German atrocities in Belgium, and if a twentieth part of this report is authentic it shows a series of outrages unparalleled in the annals of civilization. Many of them were so obscene and revolting in their details that I will not recount them here. We must remember, however, that this report comes from sources intensely antagonistic to Germany and no opportunity was given the German authorities to cross-examine the hostile witnesses who had recently been subjected to repeated outrages by the invading Germans. On the other hand, the fact that the leading writers and thinkers of Germany advocate a pitiless war of terrorism, together with the high standing and character of the members of the British commission, entitle this report to earnest consideration and credit.

The only excuse ever offered why these murders and outrages were committed on men and women and little children was that in some instances it was charged that civilians had fired upon German soldiers. These charges were rarely sustained, because the people of Belgium, terror stricken, did not, for the most part, dare to lift their hands against the cruel and ruthless invader. The finding of a weapon in a house often doomed the entire family to instant execution. The sacred cloth of the priesthood of God, the weakness of womanhood, the feebleness of old age, and the prattling innocence of childhood fared alike at the hands of the barbaric German horde, which, like so many fiends from an inferno, hacked their way through prone, prostrate, bleeding Belgium. According to the British report signed by Viscount Bryce and others, after Liege was entered by the Germans hundreds of houses were burned and numbers of defenseless people were murdered. On the threshold of one house were found the dead bodies of a man, a woman, and a little girl about 9 years old. In one field 56 men were taken out and shot. Thirty-two civilians were killed in the Place de l'Universite and over 15 women were violated in open day in the public square. Some weapons were found in one house. All the inhabitants, father, mother, and little children, were driven into the yard and told to prepare for death. The family kneeled down upon the grass and began to pray. A few shots rang out and they fell back onto the green grass, and slept forever.

At Andene about 400 people were massacred and obscene orgies took place which decency forbids my relating. Eight men belonging to one family were murdered. One man was murdered in his kitchen when he was sitting with a child on each knee, and a paralytic was murdered in his garden.

The town of Namur was entered on August 24. This town made no resistance. A crowd of about 150 unarmed nonresisting civilians were on the streets watching the Germans enter the town. Germany's superiority in morals again asserted itself. They began firing upon the nonresisting, unarmed citizens and only about 10 escaped. They then burned about 140 houses. The next day the hospital was set on fire.

At Denee a cripple and an old paralyzed man of 80 were shot down in the streets. At Laurines, which made no resistance, a large number of unarmed people were shot. Aged women and little children, 5, 6, and 7 years old, among the number. At Hofstadt a civilian was stabbed in the stomach with a bayonet and his boy of 5 years of age had both his hands severed at the wrist. Six young women were stabbed to death with bayonets and a boy of 16 was repeatedly bayoneted in the chest. At Boort Meerbeck a German soldier fired three times at a little girl 5 years old, but he was a better exponent of German kultur than he was of marksmanship, and he failed to hit the screaming child as she was wildly running down the street. He pursued her and killed her with his bayonet. At Herent a German soldier shot a civilian and stabbed him with his bayonet as he lay dying on the ground. He then made a civilian prisoner smell the blood on the bayonet.

At Haescht 10 civilians were seen lying in a row by a wall, and the mutilated corpses of a woman and a child of 3 with its stomach cut open by a bayonet was lying near a house. At Weichter the corpses of a man, woman, and four young persons were found in one house. At Aerschott the priest of the village was struck several times and then shot by five soldiers, and 1,500 of the inhabitants were marched to Louvain, some very old, one over 90. The very old people were drawn in carts and wheelbarrows by the younger men. A German officer on a bicycle rode up and down the line and as people fell out by the side of the road shouted, "Shoot them."

Upon reaching Louvain these 1,500 inhabitants of the Aerschott district—men, women, and little children, who had been driven from their homes—were taken to the station, and as they stood, forlorn, helpless, homeless, broken-hearted, and terror-stricken captives, huddled together at the station, German soldiers fired a metrailleuse, a kind of machine gun, into that despairing mass of men, women, and children, while others began shooting with rifles. The people fell on all sides, and babes were seen falling out of their mothers' arms. These murders occurred in August. In September, at Haecht, several children were murdered. one of 2 or 3 years old was found nailed to the door by its hands and feet. At Capelle Au Bois two children were murdered in a cart, and at Eppeghem the dead body of a child of 2 was seen pinned to the ground with a German lance. At Alost 180 inhabitants were stated to have been shot after digging their own graves. At one country house the owner did not open the door quick enough, so he was tied and then shot. His wife came out with a little suckling child. When she saw her dead husband she put down the child and rushed at the Germans like a lioness. She was struck on the head with the butt of a rifle. Another took out his bayonet, fixed it, and thrust it through the child. He then put his rifle on his shoulder with the child upon it, its little arms stretched out once or twice. The house was then burned and the corpses thrown in it. There were about 40 prisoners standing there, and the officer in charge said to them:

I am doing this as a lesson and example to you. When a German tells you to do something next time, you must move more quickly.

Upon the retirement of the Germans after the battle of the Marne French troops entered one house, which had been occupied by Uhlans. They found two women and two children. One woman was dead, the body not yet cold. The left arm had been cut off below the elbow; the other woman was alive, but unconscious. Her right leg had been cut off above the knee. The little children, a boy about 4 and a girl about 6, were both dead. The boy's left hand and the girl's right hand were severed at the wrist.

At Sempst, after the Germans had been forced away, sickening and heart-rending exhibitions of German kultur were exposed. In their retirement the Germans took about 40 of the inhabitants with them and set the village on fire. A number of charred bodies were found in the smoking ruins of their unhappy homes. Civilians had been shot down indiscriminately in the streets, some while they were working in their shops. A farmhouse close by was on fire. There was discovered the body of the farmer, an old man, with his head cut off. Near by his two grown sons were lying dead from gunshot wounds. The wife of one had her whole left breast cut away and was covered with blood but still alive. She told the Belgian soldiers that six Uhlans came to the house and one of them said, "You have some Belgian soldiers hidden here." She replied, "No; there are none." Instantly he struck her, cutting off all of her left breast. The poor dying woman said they forced her little son, a boy 8 years old, to go up in the loft to see if there were any Belgians hidden. It was 20 feet to the loft. These inhuman monsters in the guise of men then removed the ladder, set the hay on fire, and the little fellow was burned alive. At another house the Belgian soldiers found four little children. There were no grown people around—none but these four children—three little girls and a boy, not dead but all dying, blood still flowing from four little bleeding arms, the hands hanging to the stumps only by the skin. A girl about 17 came up nearly naked, half wild, crying, and informed the horrified Belgians that 17 young girls, including herself, had been dragged into a near-by field, where unspeakable crimes had been committed, and that 12 of these young girls had been killed. Near Malines about 10 children, roped together, were driven in front of a German force to be killed by French and Belgian bullets. In the same battle about 60 or 80 Belgian civilians, men and women, were driven in front of the German troops to act as a screen for them. At Mons, on August 24, about 6 men, 20 women, and a dozen children were actually pushed in front of a German position to shelter the Germans.

At Tournai 400 Belgian civilians, men, women, and children, were placed in front of the Germans, who then, behind this living breastwork, advanced upon the French, driving the civilians before them. At Willoebrook practically the same thing happened, and one woman, who refused to advance and make of herself a living breastwork for some murderous coward to hide behind, was stabbed twice with the bayonet. As she fell a little child ran up to her and had half of its head blown away by a shot from a rifle.

Now let us take some German testimony as shown by the British report—testimony found in the diaries of captured or killed German soldiers. Some of the entries read as follows, the name and regiment of the soldier nearly always being given.

Sergt. Barthel wrote:

A transport of 300 Belgians came through Duisburg this morning. Of these, 80, including the ober burgomaster, were shot according to martial law.

Mathen, of the Fourth Jagers, wrote that his regiment was fired upon by some in the village.

About 220 inhabitants were shot and the village was burnt.

He adds—

It is a beautiful sight to see the fires all around us in the distance.

Bombarder Wetzel writes:

We had no fight, but we caught about 20 men and shot them.

Another important diary entry was No. 19. This was a blue book interleaved with writing paper and contains no name and address. There is, however, one circumstance which makes it possible to speak with certainty as to the identity of the writer. He gives the names of First Lieut. von Oppen, Count Eulenburg, Capt. von Roeder, First Lieut. von Bockunder Polach, Second Lieut. Count Hardenberg, and Lieut. Engelbrecht. A perusal of the Prussian Army List of June, 1914, shows that all these officers, with the exception of Lieut. Engelbrecht, belonged to the First Regiment of Foot Guards. On the 24th day of August, 1914, the writer was in Ermeton. The exact translation of the extract, grim in its brevity, is as follows:

24:8:14. We took about 1,000 prisoners; at least 500 were shot. Two civilians were shot at once.

I have not related the thirtieth part of the official British report, which concluded, in part, as follows:

That in the conduct of the war generally innocent civilians, both men and women, were murdered in large numbers, women violated, and children murdered. That looting, house burning, and the wanton destruction of property were ordered and countenanced by the officers of the German Army; that elaborate provision had been made for systematic incendiarism at the very outbreak of the war, and that the burnings and destruction were frequent where no military necessity could be alleged, being, indeed, part of a system of general terrorization.

That the rules and usages of war were frequently broken, particularly by the using of civilians, including women and children, as a shield for advancing forces exposed to fire, to a less degree by killing the wounded and prisoners, and in the frequent abuse of the Red Cross and the white flag. Sensible as they are of the gravity of these conclusions, the committee conceived that they would be doing less than their duty if they failed to record them as fully established by the evidence. Murder, lust, and pillage prevailed over many parts of Belgium on a scale unparalleled in any war between civilized nations during the last three centuries.

Yet Prof. Lassom, privy counselor to the Kaiser, writes, in 1914, that—

Our army is, so to speak, typical of the intelligence and morality of the German people. We have nothing to apologize for. We are not a violent people. We do good to everyone. Our strength is the strength of intellect, and our victory that of mind over matter. We are truthful. Our chief characteristics are humanity, kindness, honesty, and the Christian virtues. In this wicked world, we represent love, and God is with us.

Maximillian Harden, an intellectual half-crazed war fanatic, in his newspaper Die Zukunft is more consistent. He says:

Not against our will, and as a nation taken by surprise, did we hurl ourselves into this gigantic venture * * * our might shall create a new law in Europe. It is Germany that strikes. When she shall have conquered new domains for her genius, then the priesthood of all the gods will praise the god of war.

The French and Belgian official reports were repetitions, confirmations, and in many instances additions to the British report.

I have not related here that the reports show how repeatedly the Germans would raise a white flag, and then treacherously annihilate some company or regiment of the French or Belgians who advanced, thinking they had surrendered. I have not the time to relate the many instances in these reports where wounded soldiers after the battle were bayoneted by the Germans, nor do I feel that I ought to go into the horrid mutilations of men, women, and children. How a captured soldier had his nose cut off; how a woman was kicked in the stomach and prodded with bayonets and brained with a rifle; how captured French and Belgian soldiers were tied to trees and drunken German soldiers stuck their knives and their bayonets into the neck and faces of the unfortunate prisoners; how a wounded British soldier, crawling on the ground on his hands and knees, was beaten upon the head with the butts of rifles. I have not related the hundredth part of the atrocities committed in the name of German kultur. Nor do we have to go to the allies for all of this testimony.

Alexander Powell, the special correspondent of the New York World, is said to have told Gen. von Boehn that he had seen the mutilated bodies of women and children; that he had seen a woman with hands and feet cut off; helped to bury an old white-haired man with 22 bayonet wounds in his face; that he attended the funeral of a little girl 2 years old who was shot by a Uhlan while she was in her mother's arms; and an old man who was hung by the hands from the rafters in his own house and slowly roasted to death by a fire which was built under him. This, Mr. Speaker, from an American, and the correspondent of one of the greatest papers in the world.

The late Richard Harding Davis, the author and celebrated war correspondent who was in Belgium, was quoted as saying:

It is not a fair fight. Germany is fighting foully; she is defying not only the rules of war but the rules of humanity.

Says the Morning Post:

At this moment the words "German kultur" are synonymous for rapine, murder, and hideous cruelty.

Yet the Kaiser says:

Our people will be the granite block whereon the good God may complete the civilization of the world.

And Prof. Eucken says:

To us more than any other nation is intrusted the true structure of human existence.

Bismarck, the iron chancellor and the most intellectual of all latter-day Germans, is said to have given the real definition of Prussian kultur and Prussian militarism. He is quoted:

True strategy consists in hitting your enemy, and hitting him hard. * * * Above all, you must inflict on the inhabitants of invaded towns the maximum of suffering. You must leave the people through whom you march only their eyes to weep with.

Bismarck again said:

If we can not provide troops for the whole of the territory which we occupy, we send a flying column from time to time among the recalcitrant communities. We shoot, hang, and burn. After that has been done several times they end by becoming reasonable.

When the highest in the land, the protector of the Turk, thought he was the agent of God and advised his soldiers to "gain a reputation like the Huns under Attila," it is no wonder that Germany has been declared a common enemy and that all civilization is in arms against her.

I can well understand now what Irvin Cobb, the great American war correspondent, meant when he wrote that to his mind the most distressing sight, and one that haunted him in his dreams, was the startled look of fear in the eyes of every child he saw in Belgium. They were scared, timorous, shrinking, starting in trembling dread at every sound, a look of frightened bewilderment and terror on their young faces. They had fled from their homes, many of them in the nighttime. They had heard the roaring of cannon, the screaming of shells, and the whistling of bullets. Some of them had seen their fathers shot down, they had seen their terror-stricken mothers roughly shoved around by German soldiers. They had been driven from place to place. They had heard the gruesome tales of little ones stabbed and bayoneted and shot, and their little bodies were quivering with fear and shaking with terror. Just a few days before these little ones were happy, care-free children, like your children and my children, and the unexpectedness and the suddenness and the awful brutality of the German attack brought a bewildered, startled look of terror to these Belgian children's eyes which was pitiful to behold.

The Book of Books tells us:

And whosoever shall offend one of these little ones that believe in Me, it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and he were cast into the sea.

The United States did not want to enter this war, and while willing to make any sacrifice short of the surrender of national honor to keep from being drawn into the conflict, was yet determined that all the protection guaranteed by international law should be thrown around the citizens of the United States. Upon several different occasions we were on the verge of war, and it was only by the wonderful ability and still more wonderful patience of President Wilson that war was averted.

From the beginning, while acting at all times with the most extraordinary patience and tact, President Wilson has stood upon the broad foundation of international law. He has ever been guided by those statutes which for years have been laid down and agreed to by the civilized nations of the world as the course and policy for a neutral nation to pursue in dealing with a belligerent nation.

One of the first troubles which confronted the United States arose out of the selling of munitions of war to the allies. Germany and Germany's friends naturally resented this. The munition makers of the United States were willing to sell munitions to Germany, but England's blockade prevented their delivery. The right of a neutral country to sell munitions of war to a belligerent nation has been guaranteed by international law for over a hundred years. During the comparatively recent Balkan wars Germany freely availed herself of this right and at different times sold munitions to all of the belligerent Balkan States. This right is based upon sound public policy. The best energies of every country in times of profound peace, while not neglecting proper and adequate means of national defense, should be devoted to the education of children, the development of agriculture, the establishment of new industries, the increasing of commerce, and the encouragement of all kinds of legitimate business. All the energies of a country should not be devoted to the making and storing of vast supplies of war munitions to the detriment of everything else. If the laws of nations forbade the purchase of war munitions by belligerents from neutrals not only would it interfere with the legitimate industries of the neutral countries, but what is far more serious, the richest nation, or that nation which concentrated all of its energies and its resources in the manufacturing and storing of vast quantities of war supplies, would be at much advantage over and a constant menace to its more peaceful neighbors. It would also force these neighbors to curtail the appropriations for education and the encouraging and developing of agriculture and commerce and devote all its energies to manufacturing munitions, which policy, if pursued by all, would keep the world perpetually in a state of unrest, would make taxes oppressive, and the country would always be on a war basis. Then again, if the United States refused to sell munitions of war to belligerent neutrals, in case we got into a war we would ourselves be estopped from buying munitions from a neutral country.

Our country was well within its rights both as to international law and common sense when Congress refused to put an embargo upon the selling and exporting of munitions of war. We said to the belligerent nations: "We are manufacturing war munitions; we will sell them to you, but we will not deliver them; come to our shores and get them if you want them and are willing to pay for them."

This invitation included the central powers as well as the entente, but there was practically no way for Germany to secure them, as the English fleet controlled the seas. However, Germany did buy munitions from the United States. The German submarine Deutschland returning to Europe after its wonderful trip to the United States carried with it over $1,000,000 worth of war munitions.

The next serious controversy with Germany grew out of the destruction of the Lusitania. Germany's answer to England's blockade was a submarine war against the commerce of the allies. Notwithstanding international law provided in the capture of belligerent vessels, the due observance of making this capture with every reasonable regard to the life of the crew, the security of the cargo, and the safe conveying of the prize to a port of entry for adjudication, and the protection of the captured from all injury as far as possible, German submarines violated all of these provisions and struck without warning, condemning both crew and cargo to destruction. While this course could be viewed only with the utmost disfavor by all the civilized countries of the world, yet it was never dreamed that the German submarine warfare would be conducted against passenger boats and the great ocean liners carrying hundreds of passengers who owed allegiance to the flags of countries not at war with Germany. When the news was flashed to America that the great floating palace, the Lusitania, with over 2,000 souls on board, had been struck without warning and that many of the passengers and crew had perished, a thrill of horror and intense indignation over this barbarous act was felt from one end of the United States to the other, which indignation was tremendously increased when it was learned that of the 1,000 men, women, and little children who perished 137 were Americans. Our relations with Germany at that time were already strained. About six weeks before the British passenger ship Falaba was sunk and an American citizen lost his life. About the same time the American steamer Cushing was attacked by airships, and a few days afterwards the American steamer Gulflight was attacked by submarines. The destruction of the Lusitania and the murder of 137 Americans brought forth a vigorous protest from the United States. It seemed as though the countries were on the verge of war, but Germany assured the Government of the United States that American ships would not be hindered in the prosecution of legitimate shipping, and the lives of American citizens on neutral vessels should not be placed in jeopardy. The Government of the United States relied on this promise, but the barbarous and ruthless warfare continued.

Out of this warfare sprang the famous McLemore resolution, to notify all American citizens that if they traveled in armed merchant belligerent vessels and were injured or murdered upon the high seas they traveled at their own peril, and the United States would not hold any country to account for such murder.

The adoption of this resolution would have been a shameful confession of the United States' inability to protect the lives and property of its own citizens. It would have justly held us up to the contempt of all civilization as a nation unwilling to protect its own people from assassination by a foreign power. Travel is a necessary part of some people's business, and because other nations were at war to ask our people to stop traveling, to stop looking after their own business, to lose their means of livelihood, and keep away from the great ocean highways which since the beginning of time have been free and open to the world was intolerable and unendurable.

A citizen of the United States has the right to expect, to demand, and to receive protection from his Government as he sails the seven seas, a protection always given to him in the past, once against English sailors in 1812, against Algerian pirates in 1815, and he is entitled to this protection against German assassins in 1916.

Still the murder of American citizens went on until in December, 1915, the German Government promised our Government that—

> Liners will not be sunk without warning and without the safety of the lives of the noncombatants, provided that liner does not try to escape or offer resistance.

But in the next 60 days four or five more ships were sunk, over 400 people were drowned, and an American consul, traveling to his post, was murdered. Still the United States forebore to go to war, and again protested to the German Government and again Germany promised to accord safety to the passengers and crew before sinking the vessel. Once more Germany defaulted and our Government threatened to sever diplomatic relations. Then Germany agreed to sink no vessels except in accordance with the general principles of visit and search, and that full opportunity would be given for all Americans to escape.

On January 31, 1917, however, Germany notified the United States that from and after February 1, she would forcibly prevent all navigation, including vessels of both belligerents and neutrals, in a zone around Great Britain, France, and Italy, and that all sea traffic would be stopped or the vessels sunk without warning.

Such a notification after all the German promises came to us like a clap of thunder from a clear sky. As the Secretary of State in a recent speech said that—

> It needed but the words reported to have been uttered by the German chancellor to complete the picture of the character of his Government when he announced that the only reason why the intensified submarine campaign was delayed until February last was that sufficient submarines could not be built before the time to make the attacks on commerce efficient.
> Do you realize that this means the promises to refrain from brutal submarine warfare, which Germany had made to the United States, were never intended to be kept; that they were only made in order to gain time to build more submarines and that when the time came to act the German promises were unhesitatingly torn to pieces like other "scraps of paper"?

This notice of Germany that all belligerent and neutral vessels would be sunk without warning whether they carried contraband or not, whether they were loaded with cargoes or not, whether they were passenger vessels or not, was nothing more nor less than an official declaration of piracy upon the high seas.

It is said that way back in the dim and misty past, when primitive men, sleeping in trees and dens and caves, would meet one of their own kind who did not belong to their immediate family and whom they had perhaps never before seen, that no questions would be asked, no quarter would be given, but with lowered head and bared fangs they would silently, ferociously hurl themselves one upon the other, and with fist and tooth and foot and nail fight it out to the last. If this be true, if mankind in the early morning of human existence was on so low a plane and men fought at random like the beasts of the forest, then it may well be said that the call of the wild has hearkened back for hundreds of centuries and now after nearly 2,000 years of Christianity finds its expression in the ruthless German submarine warfare, where silently, stealthily, and in the nighttime, neutral and stranger vessels are set upon and all on board are murdered without even the murderer knowing or caring who his victims are. This notification meant that nearly 2,000,000 square miles of ocean should be syndicated by Germany. The right to travel the seven seas is as inalienable a right as the right to breathe. [Applause.] In 1812, when we were but an infant Republic, the greatest maritime country in the world questioned this right. All the world knows what happened. How the young Republic arose in the vigorous strength of its manhood and settled forever the question as to whether the Stars and Stripes should wave in every port and on every sea. And now, over an hundred years later, when we have grown to be the mightiest Republic on the face of the earth, Germany tells us we must surrender the rights and liberties our fathers, when we were but an infant Republic, bought and paid for with their blood. That if we dare to sail these seas except in a certain course laid out by Germany a few ships a month, painted, as has often been said, like a barber's pole, that German submarines in the daytime or the nighttime will creep silently, stealthily, beneath the surface of the water and send our ships, passengers, and crew to destruction. Are we less patriotic than our fathers were? Do we intend to sit supinely by and permit one country to monopolize all the highways of ocean traffic? Are we willing to surrender our rights and tie our ships up into the docks until this war is over?

There was but one answer to this arrogant, cruel, bloodthirsty decree, whereby one nation decided to syndicate the ocean waters for its own exclusive use. Diplomatic relations were severed, and President Wilson instructed Secretary Lansing to give Ambassador Bernstorff his passports.

There are some even to-day who claim that we have as much grievance against England as we have against Germany, because England also established a dead line. It is true that England maintained a blockade and has seized our cotton and our vessels. This is true, and we protested in every instance, and it will be for the court to decide whether the prize be lawful or not. In fact, I understand that in nearly every instance the cotton seized has been paid for by the British Government. England may have seized some of our merchant vessels, but she did not send them to the bottom of the deep. England may have seized some of our cotton, but she did not murder our citizens upon the high seas. England's blockade was a visible blockade of ships, not beneath the waters but sailing on the surface of the waters. Ships were captured in endeavoring to circumvent this blockade, but they were not sunk, nor were the crews and passengers murdered. Great Britain and Germany both mined the North Sea, and we protested, but did not go to war about it. Immediately after the severance of diplomatic relations Congress attempted to enact a law authorizing American merchantmen to be armed with small guns so as to be protected from the attack of submarines. There was some objection to this, and it failed to become a law. Events followed quickly. Congress adjourned, more American vessels were sunk, and more American lives were lost.

Nor were these our only grievances against Germany. Our country was overrun with German spies. German agents blew up our railroad bridges. They have destroyed some of our munition plants and our factories, and have plotted the destruction of many others. They have endeavored to stir up strife in our sister American Republics against us. Their accredited officials here in the United States, taking advantage of their official positions, the opportunities such positions afforded to acquire information, and the protection that international law throws around an envoy from a neutral country, have endeavored to involve us in a war with Japan and with Mexico. While we were at peace with all the world, German officials here in the United States were secretly trying to bribe Mexico to attack us, and offered to convert the States of New Mexico and Arizona into Mexican provinces. Our flag had been insulted in an hundred ways. Our people had been murdered on the high seas. The mangled bodies of American men, women, and children, drifting in the waters, cruelly and barbarously put to death by German submarines, turning their pale and shrunken faces toward America, "plead like angels trumpet tongued against the deep damnation of their taking off." We have seen how Germany treated helpless, bleeding Belgium, and we know that if Germany had the power, as it has the will, here in America, it would murder our men, women, and children and devastate our fair land as they have devastated Belgium, Serbia, and Roumania.

Our conflict with Germany was inevitable. As long as the Republic of the United States lived and flourished, it was the one unanswerable reply to German autocracy and Prussian militarism. A victorious Germany, with all of Europe lying bleeding and prostrate at its feet, would naturally have bent all its energies in destroying that country whose ideals and civilization was a reproach and a menace to the militarism and autocracy of the Imperial German Empire. Again, Germany was jealous of our growing commercial supremacy, and avarice would have been added to the hate and fear the Hohenzollerns bear toward a people who are free.

Secretary Lansing said a few days ago in a speech:

Let us understand, once for all, that this is no war to establish an abstract principle of right. It is a war in which the future of the United States is at stake. If any among you have the idea that we are fighting others' battles and not our own, the sooner he gets away from that idea the better it will be for him, the better it will be for all of us.

Relying on the fact that the American people have always been more or less opposed to a large military establishment, and knowing how utterly unprepared we were at the commencement of the great war, the humiliation of the United States doubtless seemed an easy matter to the Kaiser if once he had succeeded in subduing and terrorizing all of Europe. But the young giant of the West has awakened, and our entry into this world-wide war means the end of Prussian militarism and autocracy. Our people are a peace-loving, a liberty-seeking people. We did not enter this war for the love of conquest. Our brave boys are not going to the trenches of France to fight for territorial expansion. We are waging no war for the aggrandizement of our country. We have entered this war in self-defense. We have entered this war to preserve the eternal principles of free government. We have entered this war to protect our honor and to defend our homes and our firesides. We have entered this war to maintain the freedom of the seas and to see that the inalienable rights of mankind, so dear to the hearts of all lovers of human liberty, do not perish forever from the face of the earth. We are fighting for the ultimate happiness, prosperity, and liberty of all mankind.

As one man, our country has responded to the President's call, and the greatest material resources of any country in the world's history will be behind Pershing and his men as they carry the Stars and Stripes into the trenches of Europe. We will carry this war through to a speedy and a successful determination. The skies of the Fatherland will be darkened by the clouds of American aeroplanes. Millions, if necessary, of as brave soldiers as ever offered their lives for their country's cause will face the German Kaiser's guns, while the mighty bosom of the ocean will be dotted here and there with countless American vessels, carrying supplies to our men and our allies, and driving the murderous German submarine from the waters of the sea.

Here at home, though, our hearts will ever be with our brave boys who, "like bridegrooms stepping to a marriage feast," will meet the red storm of German fire and blood across the sea, yet our minds and our thoughts will be united in a firm resolve to leave nothing undone to expeditiously and successfully carry on this war.

To-day, thank God, geographical but not sectional lines mark the only division in our country, when over 100,000,000 united American people who love their country and their flag more than life and next to their God are all marching one way, keeping step to the music of those words:

Together shouts Niagara its thunder-toned decree,
Together echo back the waves upon the Mexic sea.
Together sing the sylvan hills where old Atlantic roars,
Together cry the breakers upon the wild Pacific shores.
Together say the people, and together it shall be
An everlasting charter bond, forever for the free,
Of liberty the signet ring, the one eternal sign,
Be those united emblems the Palmetto and the Pine.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

THE PRODUCTION OF COPPER AND THE LABOR UNIONS.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to make my first speech on woman suffrage as a war measure, because I believe it is the most important question before the American people in our world struggle for democracy. It is a step that must be taken if we are to solve with justice the problems that come before us. I hope that the time is not far distant when I may talk upon that subject; but to-day I must talk to my resolution, which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the President to take over and operate metalliferous mines in certain cases.

Resolved, etc., That the powers granted to the President by section 10 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August —, 1917, to requisition and take over mines for use or operation by the Government, are hereby extended to apply to metalliferous mines, the product of which is a necessary raw material in the manufacture of supplies needed for the common defense.

Miss RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I find in studying the powers that have been granted to the President to enable him to carry on the war, he has been given power to commandeer and operate practically every industry that is engaged in supplying materials necessary for the conduct of the war. Among other things, he is given the power to take over and operate the coal mines, but nowhere has he been given the power to take over metalliferous mines.

At this time copper, a metal essential to the every-day life of people in every part of the civilized world, is a basic necessity in war. It is a necessity that we can not overlook at this time. You have been informed by the daily press that the copper mines in the West, in Arizona and Montana, have not been operating to their fullest capacity. This is due to the fact that the mine owners and the mine workers have been unable to agree. The result has been an alarming decrease in the production of copper. According to the estimates of the Council of National Defense, the production in Butte in July was only 12,000,000 pounds, while the normal output is 30,000,000 pounds a month. This disagreement has also meant a great lawlessness. In Bisbee hundreds of men were deported in complete contempt of law and order. In Butte a man was lynched by masked men.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the lady yield for a question?

Miss RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did this man who was hanged belong to an organization which declares that it owes allegiance to no government?

Miss RANKIN. I understand that he belonged to the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, if that is what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is the lady familiar with the preamble and the basic law of that outfit?

Miss RANKIN. Yes; but this is a question of lawlessness. It is not a question of whom they hanged. [Applause.]

As our laws read to-day, there is no means for handling the situation. I am advised that the President has no real power by which to act. Therefore I am introducing this resolution, which I hope the committee will have ready to report to Congress when the absent Members return.

I have tried by every means that I know of to get governmental machinery in action to handle this deplorable situation in my State. I have been kept in close touch with the situation in Butte. After the deportation occurred in Bisbee I received telegrams from Butte asking for Federal protection. I reported this to the Department of Labor and was informed that the department was doing all in its power to handle the situation through its representative, Mr. Rogers. A week ago last night I received a telegram at midnight saying that Mr. Rogers had left Butte, that no satisfactory settlement had been made, and that the people feared violence, and urged me to ask Secretary Wilson for protection. I telephoned this message to the Secretary at once. He asked me to see him the next day. I tried all the next day, until late in the evening, and was still trying to see the Secretary on Wednesday morning, when I received word that a man had been lynched.

Then came more appeals for protection. I tried to see the President, the Department of Labor, the Department of Justice, and, finally, the War Department. The only satisfaction I received was in the War Department, when I convinced them that the troops guarding the mines had been federalized, and therefore were under Federal control. Then it was agreed that some investigation of the situation would be made. In a crisis of this kind, coming as it does in time of war, when all our attention should be centered upon the enemy and not on local difficulties, there should be some effective means by which the Government would be able to protect itself against a decrease in necessary productiveness, and by which the people of each State would be guaranteed the protection provided by the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Some explanation of the situation in Butte may be helpful at this time. Just before the outbreak of the European war difficulties in the Butte Miners' Union resulted in the disruption of the union, so that for the past three years the men have been working in Butte mines practically unorganized. For some years the Anaconda Copper Mining Co. has been using what is called in Butte the "rustling-card system." This rustling-card system is practically a blacklist on a national scale, or perhaps it had better be called a "white list." It works in this way: The Anaconda Copper Mining Co. has an employment bureau to which every miner must apply if he wishes a job. Here his record is investigated, and if it is found that he has never complained of his working conditions, if he has a clean record as to unions—that is, if he is not what they call an agitator—or if he has voted the right political ticket, he is given a rustling card. This card is in effect a permit, as we say in the West, "to rustle" for a job. The man who applies for work at any mine is first asked to show his rustling card. If he can not produce one, he is not hired. This rustling-card system has effectively discouraged the men from organizing. It has prevented them from demanding the enforcement of laws requiring safety devices in the mines. It has caused them to hesitate to discuss their grievances on the outside. The conditions of the mines have grown more and more unsafe. I have had heartbreaking letters from the wives of the miners saying that when their husbands went to work they never knew whether or not they would ever return, and that they lived in constant anxiety.

On June 8, 160 men were burned to death in a fire in one mine. This was the climax. The men stopped work.

The workers knew that they would never be safe as long as the rustling-card system existed. For under that system every man who complained of conditions or reported dangers or endeavored to form an organization was laid off for one reason or another, and it would be impossible for him to obtain work again in any mine in Montana or elsewhere. This rustling-card system is opposed by every legitimate labor organization in my State and it is easy to see the necessity of abolishing it.

Mr. John D. Ryan, of New York, the president of the Anaconda Copper Mining Co., is the man responsible for this situation. You are probably all familiar with Mr. Ryan's name in connection with his recent affiliation with the activities of the American Red Cross. If Mr. Ryan says the rustling-card system must be abolished, it will be. I have tried in vain to draw this fact to his attention, however. My telegrams have reached Mr. Ryan, but as yet I have received no response. The question I wished to ask Mr. Ryan was whether at this time, considering the great needs of the country in war, he would agree to abolish the rustling-card system, to meet grievance committees, and to recognize a union, a bona fide union, if it was organized.

Telegrams to-day say that the conditions in Butte are as bad as ever. And on my own responsibility I am urging a measure which I hope may relieve the situation.

It was with regard to these same mines that the newspapers some months ago were filled with the news of large Government purchases of copper for the war. Through the patriotic efforts of some prominent men the Government was able to secure copper for 16.67 cents a pound when the market price was 32 cents. At this price the Government purchased 50,000,000 pounds of copper, and later purchased 50,000,000 more. However, the companies refused to accept this same price, and they are now waiting for the Committee on War Purchases to say what they will pay. This incident has received no publicity. But it is interesting to the American people to know that if the committee sets the price at the present market price of 28 cents, this one purchase will cost the Government $6,000,000 more than the advertised price. Added to this, the copper interests have the advantage of not being on the embargo list.

Under these circumstances I believe it is imperative that the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army, be given the power to take over the metalliferous mines and operate them for the benefit of the Nation. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The lady from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend her remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, before that request is put I want to ask the lady from Montana if she will answer a question: Did the lady from Montana undertake to lay any of these facts that she has so graphically depicted before the President or before the heads of any of the executive departments?

Miss RANKIN. I tried to see the President and the Attorney General in order to lay those facts before them, and also the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of War, just as I reported. I was unable to see the President.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did you receive information from any one of the departments, the Attorney General's department in particular, as to whether any action might be expected against those who control the copper output, as the lady described it?

Miss RANKIN. I was told there was no way to get action except by utilizing moral influence and asking Mr. Ryan to try to act for the benefit of the Nation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the lady from Montana bring to the attention of the department officials the lynching of the man to whom she has referred?

Miss RANKIN. I appeared before the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of War and tried to see the Attorney General.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And what satisfaction did the lady receive?

Miss RANKIN. No satisfaction, except as I have stated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized for nine minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to know how it is that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] comes to be recognized at this time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] yielded him three minutes and the lady from Montana yielded him six minutes, and six and three make nine, and he is recognized for nine minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no desire, of course, to interfere with the gentleman from North Carolina, and would like to hear him speak, but it seems to me this was not in the agreement.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The Speaker has already ruled that it was.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has ruled that it has been the immemorial custom of the House, so far as he knows, that when one Member gets leave to make a speech and has time assigned him he can dole it out. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

PROSECUTION OF THE WAR.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would not have asked for time the other day but things have occurred in part of the district which I have the honor to represent. These things occurred, some of them, since the unanimous-consent agreement was made, and wishing to have something to say with respect to those matters, I asked our lady colleague from Montana [Miss RANKIN] if she would kindly yield to me part of her time, when she very courteously agreed to, and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] if he would yield me three minutes, which he agreed to do, and therefore I gained the nine minutes, for which I wish to thank both of my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, we are told in news columns of our daily papers of opposition in a few localities to the selective-draft law. It is said there is some opposition in the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent. My information, which I am sure is correct, is that the opposition to the enforcement of this law is confined to a few persons in two or three localities. With very few exceptions the people stand as a solid mass in support of the Government in enforcing the law and in a vigorous prosecution of the war. When these few misguided citizens have a little time to reflect, when they are informed and advised of their rights, when they realize that the law will be enforced without partiality, that it is absolutely just to all, North Carolina will know no division or dissension within her borders. [Applause.]

It is not surprising there should be discontent in a few localities when we see the example set by a few—a very few—Representatives of the people in Congress. We have seen a strange spectacle. We have seen gentlemen who voted for the declaration of war almost immediately thereafter set out on a course of obstruction. We have seen gentlemen vote to declare war and almost immediately proceed to criticize anything and everything the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has done or tried to do to prosecute war vigorously in order to insure early victory. When these gentlemen voted to declare war they well knew the enormous expense the Government must bear, and yet we see them placing obstacles in the way of measures absolutely necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. When these gentlemen voted to declare war they well knew a great army would have to be raised and sent to help our allies win victory, and yet we now hear the opinion expressed that no American soldier should be sent to Europe to fight unless he is willing to volunteer and go, anyhow. These gentlemen knew this Nation would be forced to conserve and control our food supply, and yet they have talked and talked and delayed and obstructed, criticized, and found fault, and even now the food-control bill is not a law. It should have become a law nearly a month ago. It is hard to understand just what object these gentlemen have in view. What is it they hope to accomplish? Shall we declare war and then refuse to do our part? Shall we permit our great food supply to be wasted when we know every pound of it is needed? Shall we declare war and then refuse to fight when we know the life of the Nation is at stake?

As God will be my judge, I felt I was doing my duty when I voted to declare war. There was no alternative, for Germany had been waging war on us for more than a year. Having cast that vote, the responsibility, in part, is mine, and it seems to me now my first and highest duty is to help as best I can in providing ways and means for a vigorous, determined prosecution of the war.

O, Mr. Speaker, we all hate war and we all long for the blessing of peace. We can make early peace possible only by showing the Imperial German Government that every ounce of energy this Nation possesses shall be expended to bring victory, and that we are ready to make any sacrifice. [Applause.]

Never have men fought for a more righteous cause. America has never been defeated; probably because she has never fought an unrighteous war. And right now the Nation is being born again.

A nation, like a human soul, to become pure, must go through a process of regeneration. There are sacrifices to be made, but when we win, as we shall, what will the victory mean?

It will mean that the rights of our citizens shall be forever respected; but it will mean far more than that—it will mean perpetual peace for America and for all people living under a just government of their own. [Applause.] It will mean the ending of this mad rush of nations to outstrip each other in building great ships utterly useless except in case of war. It will mean that great standing armies are no longer necessary, for there will be a bond of peace so strong, binding together great, free nations, that any remnant of autocracy which remains will never dare attack these forces banded together to preserve the peace of the world.

It will mean many things more which make especially for the greatness of America. And in the years to come the men whom the world will honor and remember will not be those who now are obstructing, criticizing, finding fault [applause], not the poor, deluded, ignorant man who, following the advice of some crank, is giving money to test the constitutionality of the selective-draft law; not the still more ignorant or vicious man who thinks he is justified in shooting officers charged with the duty of executing that law; but those whom the whole world will remember and honor will be those who fight to win this war. [Applause.]

America has entered the war, and it may be we see the first faint glow of the dawn of peace. We can not bring that day nearer by criticizing those who are doing their best to bring victory. [Applause.] Those who pursue this course may be the direct instrumentalities of postponing the day for which all good men pray. We may bring a little nearer the happy day by presenting to the world a united front and by supporting those intrusted with the conduct of the war as best we can. [Applause.]

The great mass of American people feel that the very life of the Nation is involved in the issue of this war. When President Wilson, Col. Roosevelt, Mr. Taft, and Mr. Root tell us, in effect, that everything is at stake we are bound to admit the probable gravity of the consequence. But certain gentlemen would have the courts say whether, having declared war, we must now fight to win. The courts must be permitted to say whether America is to live or perish. That is the meaning of the proposal to test the constitutionality of the selective-draft law.

Mr. Speaker, you might as well raise the question whether it is constitutional to have any organized government, whether it is constitutional for a nation to fight when attacked.

The man who means what he says when he declares he wants to see the war ended will now do all he can to help his Government in this crisis. The obstructionist in Congress and elsewhere should have seen a banner which was borne down Pennsylvania Avenue during the Confederate reunion by a company of veterans from North Carolina.

The banner was seen by many a tear-dimmed eye, borne aloft by one of these venerable men. It said, "Damn a man who ain't for his country, right or wrong." [Applause.] And in that applauding throng which lined the Avenue men who swore not at all were heard to say "Amen." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, instead of stirring up strife, let us proceed to pass a law suggested by Secretary McAdoo, insuring the lives of the men who go to the front. [Applause.] Let these men know they are to be the wards of the Nation; that if they come home wounded they will be cared for by the Government; that if they lay down their lives their families shall never suffer. And let us proclaim to the world that all men who fight in this war make up the grand army of human liberty, deserving the gratitude of all freemen forever. [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTIONS AND THE SELECTIVE DRAFT.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to charm the House by a manner so convincing as that of the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] who has preceded me. I listened with great interest to her remarks. Coming as I do from the State which produces more copper than any other in the Union—600,000,000 pounds of the red metal were made in Arizona last year—I stand ready to vote with the lady from Montana, and every other Member who wants to see this war carried to a successful conclusion, for any measure that will provide for the uninterrupted production of this basic necessity. If the operators of the copper mines of the United States and the men who work in them can not patriotically agree, there is a Federal power that will make it possible to produce copper; and I shall therefore vote for the Rankin resolution whenever it is brought up for consideration in the House. [Applause.]

I do desire, however, to secure your earnest attention to another question of immediate importance. The selective-draft act is now in full operation. The local boards in every county and city in the United States are to-day considering the claims of thousands of men between the ages of 21 and 31 for exemption from military service. I venture to say that, first or last, almost all of these boards will be called upon to certify one or more appeals to the district boards based upon what is called a "conscientious objection" to taking any part in war.

The district boards must consider all of these appeals, and the Federal courts will be compelled to pass sentence on men convicted of a refusal to serve in the National Army. There will be so many cases of this kind that I believe it well worth while that there should be some discussion in the House of the motives which impel a considerable number of our citizens to resist the draft. We should also give consideration to the form of punishment that should be meted out to them for their disobedience of this law.

This is no new problem. Among all races of men and in all recorded time a stubborn minority has existed which has refused to agree with the great body of their brethren as to what should be done in any given crisis. In times of peace we have learned to tolerate these contentious minorities; first, because their objections can be ignored as mere argument; and, second, because it has often been demonstrated that the minority was right and its opinions should not therefore be suppressed. But when a Nation goes to war and these peace-time protestations are translated into a firm and defiant refusal to serve in the common cause, patience with the objectors is lost, the majority quickly becomes intolerant, and prompt and sometimes brutal punishment is visited upon the objectors.

The selective-draft act recognizes the existence of conscientious objectors to the extent that members of well-known religious sects or organizations opposed to participation in war are not compelled to perform combatant service. The Society of Friends, commonly known as Quakers, is the sect that is primarily responsible for this admission that some men feel compelled to obey the indwelling voice of God in their souls. Whenever what they consider to be a Divine command has conflicted with the claims of the State and society, they have not hesitated to follow the higher authority. By the purity of their lives, their self-discipline, their willingness to submit unflinchingly to severe punishment and even death rather than take part in war, the members of this church have convinced the world that they are acting only from the highest motives and that their convictions are therefore worthy of respect.

The Moravians, Mennonites, Dukhobors, Molokans, Anabaptists, and a number of other well-recognized religious organizations whose members have likewise defended their consciences at the cost of pain and obloquy, will also be benefited by this provision of the law, for time has taught statesmen that attempts to browbeat or coerce such religious enthusiasts will accomplish nothing. There are a number of men, however, not affiliated with any recognized church, who, as individuals, have religious convictions against war which they hold dearer than life. They are not benefited by the exemption provided in the selective-draft act, and, while few in numbers, their resistance will present a difficult problem for solution.

Whether the religious convictions of such men are to be recognized, depends largely upon our definition of conscience. If we are to look upon "the still, small voice within" as an authentic and authoritative message from God to the individual in whom and to whom it speaks, then such a person is a law unto himself and can not be bound by any man-made enactment. This was the old conception of conscience, but it is not concurred in by modern religious philosophers. The new theory recognizes that it is useless to discuss the origin of conscience, but that a more sound conclusion can be reached by observing how it operates. We now realize that a man's conscience is subject to growth and education. It is influenced by heredity and environment, and this is proven by the fact that the son of a Quaker will usually have a Quaker's conscientious objection to war.

Since men's consciences vary at different times and in different circumstances, we have a right to inquire as to how far the inner voice should be followed as a sure guide to conduct. The problem is not simple but most complex, and it is for this reason that men have established a moral law outside of themselves. Conscience is now generally looked upon as but one department of human knowledge. The very fact that men who are equally conscientious take opposite views of their duty is conclusive proof that the faculty of judging between right and wrong is fallible and that it needs correction by the collective conscience of the community or the Nation.

When a man says that he proposes to engage in obstinate resistance to the State in the name of God, have we not a right to inquire as to whether he has an adequate knowledge of all the circumstances which lead him to this conclusion? May we not ask whether he might not be mistaken and have confused his own self-will with "The stern daughter of the voice of God"? It is so easy to pretend that no one can complain if his objection is put to the test. As Cromwell said, "Think it possible that you may be mistaken." If the course of action proposed is disadvantageous and unpleasant, we have a better right to presume that the individual is acting from conscientious motives than in cases where an appeal to conscience would secure relief from danger and distress.

To those individuals who literally interpret the divine command, "Thou shalt not kill," we have a right to ask whether they do not exaggerate the value of physical life. Most men recognize that peace and prosperity are not the highest good. The use of force is not necessarily an evil and a violation of the spirit of Christianity. It depends entirely on how they are employed as to whether or not good or evil will follow the use of forceful means.

Have we not also a right to inquire of such persons as to whether or not their conduct is essentially selfish. Some of them seem to forget that "no man liveth to himself alone," and they apparently value the salvation of their own souls above their duty to the common welfare. They are inclined to observe the letter and not the spirit of Christ's teachings. It is true that love is the greatest thing in the world, but it is not all that there is on earth. Love should not be exalted to the exclusion of righteousness and to the neglect of social justice.

These are considerations which must be pressed in the interest of those who are willing to make the last great sacrifice in behalf of humanity by throwing themselves into the present conflict. Man rarely has a choice between pure good and an adulterated evil. The war in which we are now engaged presents the alternative between two great evils, and millions of men have resolved all conscientious doubts by putting the service of others before the safety of their own souls.

Notwithstanding every argument of a religious nature that can be made in favor of participation in this war, there will be those whose consciences will not allow them to perform military service. As "Christians," without affiliations with any sect, they will take this course; and in doing so they can point to the pages of history for their justification. Gibbon tells of Maximilianus, who, when presented as a recruit by his father, obstinately persisted that his Christian conscience would not permit him to become a soldier. This happened in North Africa over 1,600 years ago. Another famous example is that of Marcellus, the Roman centurion. On the day of a public festival he threw away his arms and the insignia of his office, exclaiming with a loud voice that he would obey none but Jesus Christ, the eternal King, and that he renounced forever the use of carnal weapons and service of an idolatrous master. On his own confession he was convicted of the crime of desertion and beheaded. These examples of Christian martyrdom continue down through the ages, so that one who suffers death for conscience's sake well knows that he goes to join an illustrious company whose virtues have not gone unrecorded.

Among the Anglo-Saxon peoples it is agreed that conscientious scruples against war, when based upon religion, should be respected if possible; but are we willing to show the same charity to that larger class of objectors who have no profound religious sanction for their refusal to do military service? There are numbers of men, some calling themselves humanitarians, others designated as Anarchists, Syndicalists, and Socialists, all of them profoundly dissatisfied with the present state of society and civilization, who will not fight in any army. They hold that all men are their brothers, and they will not shed fraternal blood. Their plan to put an end to wars is very simple. Let all those who have much to lose and little to gain by war—and by this class they mean the working men and women, the common people of the world—let them say, "We will have nothing to do with this slaughter of human beings for whom we have no hatred."

These humanitarian objectors are just as firm in their convictions as those who oppose war from motives of religion. The idealism which leads them to seek a short cut to Utopia also calls forth a desire for martyrdom in a cause about the justness of which they have no doubt. They will make every sacrifice to prove their convictions genuine, in the hope that a knowledge of their sufferings will induce mankind to see the virtues of their way of reforming the world. Each one of them is an avowed propagandist. His objection to war has the ulterior purpose of furthering a particular plan for securing social justice.

While I do not desire to quarrel over words, yet it seems to me that these social objectors have no just right to base their opposition to war upon the ground of conscience. Political views or humanitarian reasons, even though held with the strongest and most sincere conviction, should not be confused with the voice of God in the soul because such opinions can claim no spiritual authority. If such sentiments, then, do not have any divine sanction, we have an undoubted right to question their reasonableness and to discuss whether they should be recognized as a basis for exemption from military service.

There is logic in the objection of the anarchist. He will not obey any command of the State for the sole reason that it is a command. He desires a life free from all external control, because he believes that each individual should be free to determine his own course of action. The anarchist resists the heavy hand of the State on all occasions, and is therefore acting normally when he refuses to be drafted into the Army.

The syndicalists, of which the Industrial Workers of the World are the American example, also have some measure of logic in their opposition to the draft. Why should a man who denies that socal reform can be accomplished by the will of the majority as expressed through the ballot, who seeks to turn over all of the industries to the workers by "direct action," who discourses on the "international solidarity of labor" and proclaims himself a "citizen of the world," be expected to view with favor a plan which forces him to abandon the "one big union" and go forth to fight for the Government that he has been denouncing?

SOCIALIST OBJECTORS.

The socialist, upon the contrary, has no such philosophy to guide him. To one who believes in the collective ownership and management, through the State, of all the means of production and distribution it follows that the lawful commands of those who manage the affairs of the Government must be obeyed, for otherwise such a scheme of things would not long endure. Obedience to the authority of the State must, therefore, be a socialistic virtue, and the individual socialist who now sets up his personal judgment against the will of the majority can not claim consistency as one of the reasons for his resistance.

The socialists of the United States have sharply divided upon the question of approving or disapproving the act of Congress which declared the existence of a state of war with Germany. Many of them are able to see that when militarism makes an attack upon democracy the immediate duty of men of every shade of political belief is to rally to the cause of liberty and freedom. Jaurés did this for France as the last act of a life devoted to agitation, if not rebellion, against his Government, and the leading men of every political party walked in his funeral procession behind the blood-red flag of revolutionary socialism as a tribute to an honest man who clearly saw his duty and did not let his past prevent him from performing it. [Applause.] The French socialists, as a unit, followed the example of Jaurés, and I only wish that I could speak as well of their American comrades. Unfortunately, not a few of our socialists still seek to distract attention to their pre-war theories at a time when the fate of democracy depends upon utter unity.

Humanitarians in general, when they presume to detach themselves, with a happy assurance of spiritual excellence, as a superior type of individual who should not be called upon to engage in the rough and dangerous work of war, should not at least deny to the remainder of mankind the privilege of questioning whether they really are all that they claim to be. Did they not come into this world like all the rest of us and find it a place where selfish men and selfish nations were struggling for the mastery? If men must be killed and nations must make war in order that the earth shall hereafter be a better place to live in, why should these idealists be permitted to blandly say for themselves that they are of too fine a fiber to engage in such bloody and distasteful tasks?

All sensible men admit that humanity has made real progress toward social justice. To deny this is to say that liberty, equality, and fraternity can never be attained. Among the steps that have been taken along this road are our own, and the French Revolution. Will any student of history say that the American and the French people, and all the world for that matter, would be as well off to-day if these conflicts had been avoided? Whatever of liberty, of enlightenment, and of material comfort that the great mass of the people in the two Republics have enjoyed during the past century can be directly traced to the sacrifices made by our ancestors who were willing to bleed and to die for the sake of freedom. If this be true, why should these modern idealists be allowed to anoint themselves with the oil of superiority and, like parasites, enjoy the blessings of a democracy which was established by force of arms? Have they no responsibility to defend this same democracy when it is attacked?

The considerations that have been submitted as to the desirability of accepting conscription by those who now object to such service either upon religious or humanitarian grounds may give some of them pause, but there is sure to be a considerable number who will remain immune to argument. In England, after the passage of the conscription acts, about 25,000 prospective soldiers declared themselves as opposed to military service, and about 5,000 men actually went to jail rather than do military duty. It is reasonable to suppose that there will be a similar number of conscientious objectors in the United States, because we have inherited the same religious traditions and individualistic political tendencies. The question therefore arises as to what is to be done with these men.

The British Government has adopted the plan of offering what is known as alternative service in works of national importance, such as the construction of roads, railways, or other public utilities. It was soon found that the conscientious objectors were utterly useless as soldiers. The plan of sending them to France was quickly abandoned. Many of the objectors, particularly the Quakers, were willing to serve in the hospital corps or other noncombatant units. But a part of them, the so-called "absolutists," declined to even serve with the Red Cross, because by their efforts men would be saved to fight again. It was with reference to men of this character that Lloyd-George said he "would only consider the best means of making the path of that class a very hard one."

In the light of the English experience in dealing with conscientious objectors, we will be justified in recommending that uniform penalties should be provided for this offense. Some method of standardizing the sentences imposed by the Federal judges and the military courts should be devised. Since drafted men will be compelled to serve until six months after the close of the war, it seems to me that those who refuse to perform this same service should at least be sentenced for an equal length of time. As I understand the situation, those who fail to register and those who appear before the local boards and then refuse to take the physical examination will be subject to trial in the Federal courts. Upon the other hand, registered men who do not appear for examination and those who are certified as physically fit automatically come under the jurisdiction of the military authorities and will be tried for desertion by courts-marshal. I presume that it will not be difficult for the Secretary of War to standardize the military sentences, but it will perhaps be more difficult to arrange with the various Federal judges for uniform penalties, because each court is sovereign within its own jurisdiction in this respect.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GORDON. You say these men who resist the draft will be punished in the Federal courts, and I suppose you assume that if they are convicted they will receive the penalty that Congress imposed for violation of that act, to wit, a year's imprisonment and a fine.

Mr. HAYDEN. The punishment was limited to not more than one year.

Mr. GORDON. Not more than one year; yes. I suppose you have noticed the proclamation of the Judge Advocate General, in which he says that he proposes to try them by court-martial and hang them. I should like to have the gentleman express his opinion about that amendment to the statute which we passed. Is it the gentleman's judgment that the Judge Advocate General can try these men by court-martial and impose the death penalty on men who have not been in the Army at all?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am merely stating the situation as it exists. If a registered man fails to appear, under the law as it is written he automatically comes under the jurisdiction of the military authorities.

Mr. GORDON. What puts him in the Military Establishment?

Mr. HAYDEN. The selective-draft act.

Mr. GORDON. Well, but the Constitution of the United States says that all persons who are not in the Army or Navy shall be entitled to a jury trial and punishment by the civil courts if they commit crimes, and they can not be punished until they are so convicted.

Mr. HAYDEN. But having been drafted into the military service of the United States, a man is in the Army and can be punished by court-martial.

Mr. GORDON. Then, why did we impose punishment by the civil courts?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is some confusion in the statute, which permits a part of these offenders to be punished in the Federal courts and the remainder to be tried by court-martial.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. The law provides, as I recall it, that one who refuses to register shall be tried in the Federal courts, and shall also be registered. The law provides that he shall be registered, in addition to being punished in the Federal courts.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Automatically.

Mr. HAYDEN. If registered and given a number, and that number is drawn, the man then comes automatically under the jurisdiction or the military authorities. If he then fails to obey any military command, he can be punished for desertion, or any other military crime. In other words, a stubborn and persistent objector who is registered and drafted, after serving a sentence imposed by a Federal judge, can be tried by court-martial and sentenced to a second term of imprisonment.

Like the gentleman from Ohio, I voted against the immediate adoption of the draft, not that I denied the right of the Nation to call every one of its citizens for service in the war but because I believed that under a system of selective volunteering all the men could be raised which the United States will be called upon to furnish during the present conflict. I was convinced that men who go to war of their own free will would make better soldiers than conscripts. It was as much for the sake of the Army as to protect the citizens that I opposed the draft. The time to discuss that question, however, is past, and we have at hand the problem of what to do with the conscientious objector, which is, and always will be, one of the unhappy results of conscription.

Mr. GORDON. The Supreme Court of the United States held in Milligan's case that a man who was not in the Army of the United States could not be punished at all under the Constitution of the United States until he was convicted in the civil courts.

Mr. HAYDEN. But if he is in the Army he can be punished by court-martial. That the punishment should be swift goes without saying. It is much better for all concerned that cases of this kind should be promptly tried, both as a warning to others and in order that the desire of the objector for martyrdom may be quickly gratified. Experience in England also shows that it is highly desirable that all persons convicted of a refusal to obey the draft act should be confined under the civil rather than under the military authority. The reason for this is that soldiers, as a rule, have but little patience with conscientious objectors, and consequently many cases of brutal and inhuman treatment have been brought to light.

If it develops that there will be a considerable number of such prisoners, they should be placed in charge of some enlightened and humane person who is familiar with modern prison methods. No cruel or unusual punishments should be imposed upon the "martyrs." They should not be confined with common criminals in any existing penal institution, but separate detention camps should be provided. For the sake of harmony and good administration, I would even segregate the religious from the political objectors.

Of course the death penalty should not be invoked. The worst way to silence any agitation is to kill the agitator. The next worse method is to treat him with brutality while imprisoned. A just punishment should comprise nothing more than a fair equivalent for the service and sacrifice which the objector avoids by his failure to become a soldier.

In arguing for comparative mildness in the punishment of conscientious objectors, I do so not so much for their sake as from a belief that, in order not to sin against the principles of liberty those in authority should show a decent respect for an honest conviction, no matter how erroneous. It can be said with truth that it was only by firm and conscientious resistance to the will of the State that the political and religious freedom which we now enjoy was won. It is, therefore, the part of wisdom to recognize the larger expediency of tempering justice with mercy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

WAR TAXATION.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I gave notice that I would speak upon taxation. It is the one great question now, whether we can stand the waste of such a war as this or whether we shall go into the same bankruptcy that has almost overwhelmed every one of the European powers without exception.

We declared war on the 2d day of April. This House passed a revenue measure about the 24th or 25th of May. That measure still sleeps elsewhere and the expenses of war go on. Every dollar of that expenditure—some talk of it here as $11,000,000,000 and some as $17,000,000,000 the first year—every dollar of that expenditure must be raised sooner or later by taxation. We as patriots must find a way to carry on the war, and we need the money and we need it now.

Production is the wealth of any country. I know that is not the view of some classes of political economists; they lay stress upon wealth which has been laid up. We had in this country in 1909 an estimated wealth of $187,739,000,000. Eleven thousand million dollars a year with interest would use that up in 14 or 15 years. We have to rely on a much greater wealth than that—the wealth that has been developed in this country in the power to produce; for in 1909 the minerals that were produced were valued at $2,115,000,000. Our crops were valued at $5,487,000,000. In 1914 our manufactures, the product of a policy in which I am proud to have had a share, were valued at $24,246,000,000, making a total in those years of lower prices of $31,848,000,000. It is fair to say that with the increase in production since 1909, when the latest figures were compiled—except in manufactures, compiled in 1914—taking into account the increase of production, and much more the increase in prices, which are double what they were then, our production every year is over $60,000,000,000, or nearly one-third of the estimated wealth of this country.

We know something about this matter of the relation of wealth to production when we look at the statistics of manufacture. The capital invested in manufactures was only a little over twenty-two thousand million dollars. The product was over twenty-four thousand million dollars, and after deducting the cost of materials and labor and salaries paid, the balance or the net surplus that went to that capital was four thousand five hundred and ten million dollars, and in this year it is at least twice if it is not three times that sum, for we know that the prices and profits have gone up in these years with the sudden demand all over the world for products, much more than the labor and other costs.

We rely upon this wealth; a share of that production taken every year would pay the expenses of this war. If our product was sixty thousand million dollars annually, 1 per cent of the money paid for these products, manufactures, and so forth, would be six hundred million dollars; 2 per cent would be twelve hundred million dollars; and 5 per cent would be three thousand million dollars. The United States have a great fund to which they can resort for the present payment of the expenses of this war, and we are leaving that fund alone, and it looks as if the revenue bill would impose most of the taxes, such as income tax and excess profits tax so that they can not be collected until next year, one year or more after the war began. We need the money now.

The bill as passed here recognized this source of income. It recognized in the first place customs duties, and it placed 10 per cent additional on everything that came into this country, whether dutiable or on the free list, except gold, silver, and so forth. That would give money from day to day as goods came through the customhouse. It was fair. The bill also imposed revenue taxes upon various manufactures. It selected only automobiles, jewelry, patent medicines, and so forth.

Among the larger manufactures there are many that stand in the same category—manufactures under patents or made under trade-marks. Sewing machines are largely made in my State. It is said that they cost about $12 apiece and they sell for $40. The great Singer Manufacturing Co. sells at a very little over cost to the Singer Co., and they distribute them. Typewriters, cash registers, agricultural implements, and tools—we need not go on with the list. Here is the statement of manufactures in the Statistical Abstract of 1916, on pages beginning at 182 and ending at 200. Take the largest items and you will find they are made in large factories, with greatly increased production between 1909 and 1914, which shows prosperity; and if you deduct the labor and salaries expenses of manufacture and cost of material, you will find that one-third of the capital is earned every year.

Take such items as these from the larger ones: Of agricultural implements the product was worth one hundred and sixty-four millions; automobiles, six hundred and thirty-three millions; brick and tile, one hundred and seventy-three millions; butter, cheese, and condensed milk, three hundred and sixty-four millions; canning and preserving, two hundred and forty-three millions, and so forth; while iron and steel products sold for thirteen hundred and thirty-six million dollars, and so forth. It is these products which are the wealth of the country, and now or later whether we borrow or not, we must look to them for the expenses of this war. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In the Civil War the United States was foolish enough not to raise money by taxation, but to issue greenbacks and bonds, and it had to pay two or three times as much for what it got, and its bonds for a long while were at a discount. They once sold at $40 on the $100. After the war people were trying to pay their debts. The great excitement of manufacturing and production which takes place in all wars, had ceased. Prices had been high during the war, during the period when bonds were issued, but then wheat was 50 cents a bushel, the farmers and the manufacturers were poor, and the South was utterly poor. It was in these hard times that we had to clench our fists and grit our teeth and fight repudiation and the greenback and silver policies to pay our debts incurred in the war and to restore our currency to a par with gold. The United States does not want to repeat that experience. If we are paying high prices now, let us not borrow at high prices and then collect taxes to pay these debts when prices have fallen and the people can not afford to pay. Let us collect what we can now. I stand with the chairman of the committee on that.

Every dollar issued in bonds must be paid hereafter. The interest upon these bonds will be low if our taxes are so imposed that money is coming in in abundance, so that the whole world knows that the United States can pay its bonds. If we want to borrow money upon our house, for God's sake let us see to it that we have rent from that house when we borrow upon the mortgage. Again, every dollar placed in bonds takes away from the citizen a feeling of the duty that he owes at this time. I desire as a Member of Congress to protest against the swarm of organized protests which have come to us whenever we have wished to tax any industry.

Most industries are making money. We were told as to automobiles that the small ones would be ruined. So far as my experience is concerned, the protests that came to me did not come from the small companies but in bunches of 50 or 60 from agents or friends of some of the largest and most prosperous companies in the United States. I am proud of the fact that the jewelry manufacturers of my town, and they are a large industry, with some 70 or 80 factories, wrote to me saying that they did not object to the 5 per cent tax upon their products, but they only asked that they should not be singled out for that purpose. There were many of us Members who were eager at that time to add taxes on money received for the products of other branches of industry, so that we could make the tax smaller than 5 per cent, which perhaps is too high, so that we could make it 1 per cent or 2 per cent or in some cases as high as 5 per cent on the great industries. We wanted to tax money paid for advertising. Newspapers are one of the list of manufactures. A manufacturer can raise his prices or cut down his profits or cut down what goes to his agents, or do something that will enable the tax to be distributed among the entire community. We want the money and we want it now.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD, under which leave he submits the following:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, when the bill was considered in the House many Members wished to add excise duties on other products. Any such amendment was held to be out of order. The rules of the House are certainly too strict when they prevent the Congress from finding means for the Government to make war.

Taxes on products fulfill the rules for taxation given by Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations.

They are equal, according to the value of the product. They are largely on luxuries. They are certain—not a matter of mere estimate. They are easily paid, because they are paid out of money actually received. They can be economically collected, and need no great army of tax gatherers; they come in large sums, and continuously.

They are according to the tradition of the United States, which has always had a revenue composed of customs and excise, which supply a large proportion of our revenue now from beer, wines, liquors, and tobacco.

They are in the nature of war taxes. The United States has usually been supported by customs duties and has not levied special excise war taxes until time of war. It is only recently that we have seen such excise in time of peace. But we welcome them in time of war as being an efficient direct method of gathering in means for the support of the Government while business is brisk and with the least friction on the community.

It is idle to say that this is hard on the business of this country. The persons who really suffer now are not those who are in business, but those who live on small fixed incomes.

The United States wants money, and it wants it now; and, instead of taxing widows and orphans upon their small inheritances, we must dip up the moneys at the fountain head, where they are paid, and as the needs of the country may require.

Of course there is no absolute certainty in any taxation. One manufacturer will sell direct to the retailer and employ agents; another will sell to the wholesalers and will pay less tax; but it will not be a bad thing for the people of this country if the manufacturer is induced by the tax to sell at reasonable prices to wholesalers, who will dispose of what they take at reasonable profits, instead of forcing the poor to pay four or five prices for sewing machines, typewriters, agricultural machinery, and automobiles. It is the public that pays the high rents for display on our fashionable shopping streets, and the quicker our manufacturers can be induced to have reasonable wholesale prices and to allow their wares to be distributed by natural competition to the consumer the better for our country. We waste too much on advertising, agencies, expensive shops, and long credits.

If we are to be efficient in war, we must learn to be efficient not only in the production but in the distribution of the wealth which is so lavishly produced and so lavishly spent.

This, however, is by and by. Our present problem is not to impose taxes under the best theories, but to have some scheme of taxation which will bring in enough money for the conduct of the war, whether that scheme be good or bad.

The House voted for increased income and inheritance taxes. We have graded those taxes without reference to the number of persons among whom the income or inheritance will be divided. In the graded inheritance tax we are following an example which in England has been almost confiscatory in case of successive deaths, and which has reduced the value of landed estates by at least half.

The House voted those taxes willingly and freely, for it represents a people who are ready to make sacrifices to carry on this war. We will vote an excess profits tax, although the estimate of such profits is subject to many difficulties, even if it be made with absolute honesty. The chairman of our Committee on Ways and Means on Friday last explained some of the difficulties.

This House will vote whatever will bring in means to the Government and support its credit in this critical hour. But the United States needs revenue now; it can not wait until next year. And as long as it has debts to pay, it can not afford to rely solely on a system which will come to an end after the war, when great incomes and excess profits will be at an end.

In this its hour of need our country will return to a tax on the money received from production. It is the earliest tax system of which we know, when we learn from the twenty-seventh chapter of Leviticus that the Israelites paid a tenth part of the land, whether of the seed of the land or of the fruit of the tree, or of the herd or of the flock, or whatsoever passeth under the rod.

Above all we need revenue legislation, and we need it quickly. It is now four months since war was declared; it is time that a willing people should be paying lavishly into the Treasury—as they will do under the law—as willingly and bravely as they are sending their sons into the National Army and risking their best blood upon the battle fields of the Old World in the defense of their country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes in which to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that that is in contravention of the agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not want to rise to a question of personal privilege if I can have not to exceed three minutes in which to amplify a question which I asked the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN], which seems to have been slightly misunderstood by some.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to speak to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why not withdraw the question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not desire to do that. I want to make the question quite clear. It seems to have been thought by some Members sitting about me that on account of the question which I asked the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] I was as a Member of the House of Representatives advocating lynch law and receiving applause for such advocacy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes in which to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is speaking to a question of personal privilege, and that is the only way that he can get in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understand that. I had wanted to ask for some time in which to discuss the affairs of the I. W. W., but I found that it could not be done, so that I have to take this method. Later I hope to secure time for a full discussion of the iniquitous activities of this organization, and its opposition to the Government. The question I asked was intended to convey the point that these very men, who, when they sign their oath, stand in opposition to the United States and in opposition to organized law, are the first to squeal when they get a dose of their own medicine. Of course I do not advocate mob law. As a matter of fact I am opposed to the death penalty for all crimes except those of treason and sedition and some of these men are guilty of these crimes. I merely desire now to call attention to the quickness with which these men who practice sabotage, who commit assassinations and preach disorder and mob rule, call upon the Government to defend them when they are in trouble.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m., in accordance with the order heretofore made) the House adjourned until Friday, August 10, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 8, 1917.

(Legislative day of Saturday, August 4, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in some remarks I made day before yesterday regarding the representation of union labor on the Council of National Defense I stated that no labor-union men had been appointed except on Mr. Gompers's committee, particularly not upon the committees on coal and railroads. I find that I am in error in that statement. Originally, there were no labor-union men appointed except the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson. Somewhat later the woman's committee was appointed, and Miss Agnes Nestor, of Chicago, was appointed. She is a labor-union member. Later the labor-union men belonging to the miners' organization made complaint that they were not recognized, and several of their members were added to the committee on coal production, but none have been added to the committee on railroads or to any other of the great committees that are doing the practical work.

I make this statement in order to correct any misunderstanding that may have been caused by my remarks day before yesterday.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	La Follette	Shafroth
Beckham	Harding	Lewis	Sheppard
Brady	Hardwick	McKellar	Sherman
Brandegee	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	James	New	Sterling
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thompson
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Page	Trammell
Fernald	Kellogg	Penrose	Vardaman
Fletcher	Kendrick	Pittman	Wadsworth
France	Kenyon	Pomerene	Warren
Gore	King	Reed	Williams
Gronna	Kirby	Saulsbury	Wolcott

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on official business. I expect him here later in the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to state that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is detained on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate on important business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I wish to take up a few minutes in the discussion of the bill. First, I wish to say something in respect to the objection raised by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the conference report. I voted for the Hollis amendment to the bill, which provided that the provisions of the bill should not be construed to prevent strikes or peaceful picketing or in any way amend or repeal the provisions of the Clayton Act. I would not favor the clause striking out this amendment if I thought it had that effect. I do not think it has that effect.

I understand that some arguments are going to be presented to the Senate to show that the bill ought not to be and can not be construed to have that effect; that is to say, to have the effect of repealing or amending the so-called Clayton Antitrust Act. I am frank to say, however, that the importance of this bill appeals to me to such an extent that I would feel warranted nevertheless in voting for the bill.

I was sufficiently interested, however, in the argument made by the Senator from New Hampshire, and by arguments already made upon the legal effect of striking out the Hollis amendment, to inquire from those who will have the administration of this law in their hands as to what construction would be placed upon it by them in the event that it became a law in its present form.

I am authorized by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, to say that the administration does not construe this bill as prohibiting strikes and peaceful picketing and will not so construe the bill, and that the Department of Justice does not so construe the bill and will not so construe the bill. I am further advised that those who have interested themselves in protecting the rights of labor do not so construe the bill and will not so construe the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator then say to us why the amendment which would have removed any necessity for construction, or any doubt, was stricken out?

Mr. HUSTING. I can not answer that question with authority, but I understand it was stricken out because it was not thought necessary or essential, that it had no effect whatever. I think it would have been wiser to have left it in, but it was stricken out, I understand, upon the argument that it was unnecessary, that the act could not legally be construed in that way, and that it was surplusage or redundancy.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will yield further, of course that kind of a reason I hardly think is a correct reason, but I wish to ask the Senator a question, because I am interested in the assurances which he tells us have been given. Of course the Secretary of Labor will not be the man to enforce the criminal provisions of this statute, because he has nothing to do with the enforcement of the criminal provisions of such a statute. Consequently his assurances amount to nothing, except the opinion in so far as it was the opinion of a very fine gentleman. The only person who could control would be the Attorney General. Has the Senator talked with the Attorney General?

Mr. HUSTING. I will say that I have not. I have not talked with the Attorney General. However, I can say that the Secretary of Labor advised me that this was the opinion of the administration and the Department of Justice. He did not give it merely as a matter of belief on his part, but said that he was authorized to so state.

Mr. REED. Now, may I ask one further question? Suppose that a complaint should be filed in a court of the United States charging the violation of this act, and that the case was lodged in court, and the judge of the court should hold that under the charge made a violation of the law had occurred, is the Senator prepared to say to the country that the Attorney General has stated that under such circumstances as that he would nullify the law and undertake to control the court?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I can not say anything further than what I have already said. I do not presume any United States district attorney will prosecute any person under this law contrary to the interpretation placed upon the law itself by his superior officer.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like the attention of the Senator from Missouri as well as the Senator from Wisconsin. My attention was greatly arrested and my interest very much aroused by the speech the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] made upon this question. Upon investigation, stimulated by the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire, I am advised—and I ask Senators what they have to say as to the conclusion I am about to utter—that the provisions we placed in the Federal Trade Commission act in the closing days of its consideration—I do not know whether Senators recall how it came about, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is entitled to credit as having written it, and my participation in it was incidental, but it enables me to recall it with accuracy—to the effect that there shall not be prosecution of farmers' organizations or members thereof or of labor organizations or members thereof for any of the acts to which we particularly addressed ourselves as criminal concerning commercial bodies, would exclude the prosecutions of which the Senator from New Hampshire had such a sincere fear.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, that is my belief. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, that is my view of it; and not only is it my view, but, as I said before, it is the view of the administration, and I am advised is also the view of the Department of Justice and of very eminent and able attorneys on the floor. I think the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire made a very able argument, and yet, notwithstanding that, I can not agree with him in his conclusions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] seemed to address his remarks to me. Will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me long enough to reply?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I desire to say that if the pending bill does by implication repeal, or if it is in its terms contrary to the terms of the Clayton Act or of the Federal Trade Commission act, of course, the last act passed would be the controlling act, and the provisions of the act previously passed would constitute no protection, assuming, of course, that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] is right in his construction of this proposed law. I think the Senator is right, as a matter of primary construction; but I think, in addition to the mere construction that would be placed upon the language itself, great weight must be given to the fact that the Senate, in order to remove all doubt and to make sure that a certain meaning would be given to the act, added an amendment expressly excepting labor organizations from the terms of the law we are now about to enact. That amendment having been objected to by the other House and having been stricken out in conference, the court will be compelled to give to that circumstance great weight, and the weight it will have will be in the direction of indicating that the legislative intent was something other and different from that which they struck out. That which they struck out was a clause excepting labor organizations; and, adding that consideration to the argument which was presented in regard to the language of the act itself, I have but little doubt that the act proposes to do exactly what the Senator from New Hampshire says it will do.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I desire to say that there is a great deal in what the Senator from Missouri says as to two legal points; one, that where a later act covers a subject matter generally, it will be presumed to be the last expression, and therefore the exclusive one; but, Mr. President, I take it that since the case of Claflin against the United States, as early as Ninety-sixth United States down to the present day, repeal by implication is not only not favored but before a later act can be regarded as repealing some previous act, the particular subject matter claimed to have been repealed must have been referred to, and that it is not repealed merely because the subsequent act is posterior in date. Therefore I can not adopt the view that this later act works a repeal merely because it may be upon a similar subject matter.

Now, as to the second point which the Senator from Missouri makes, it is a very strong point and one which we lawyers know is always convincing, that where a matter has been considered and construction given and the body having jurisdiction rejects it, it is to be assumed that they rejected on the ground that they disagree from it. I think that would be very weighty were it not for the fact that we have evidence before us that it may have been rejected because the same matter had been previously taken care of in other legislation and the same object achieved without making it necessary to be repeated, and that therefore it may have been dismissed because it was a mere repetition and unnecessary. If we have not that construction, the Senator from Missouri must be admitted as being absolutely correct in the construction he makes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to conclude my argument, unless the Senator from Missouri desires to ask a question.

Mr. REED. I simply desire, in a word, to say that I do not understand the remark of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] to the effect that this language having been stricken out would not be of any weight, because the same matter had been taken care of in other legislation. The same matter is not taken care of in other legislation. Other legislation provided that certain laws then being enacted or then existing should not be applied to labor organizations and to farmers' societies, but that has nothing whatever to do with the terms of a subsequently passed law. If the terms of the law which was subsequently passed are broad enough to include those organizations, then, unless they are expressly excepted, they will, of course, be included.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word in reply to the eminent Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. If the so-called Hollis amendment had been stricken out without anything having been said about it or without anyone claiming upon the floor of the Senate or in committee that it was for any other purpose than to negative the idea of modifying or repealing the Clayton Act or the Federal Trade Commission act, perhaps the Senator's construction might lie; but it appears here from the debate that many Senators have taken the view that this measure does not modify or repeal or amend the Clayton Act. So the action of many Senators and their votes will be based upon the assumption that it does not so modify, amend, or repeal that act, and the fact that others do think so will have no other effect than to put their opinion against the opinions of those who believe otherwise.

I should have liked the bill better if this provision had remained in it, because then there would not have been any chance for a quibble or a chance for a difference of opinion. I should have liked the bill better if the articles originally enumerated in the bill had been retained in it. I think it would have been far better, instead of awaiting the future action by Congress, to have put the power at once in the hands of the President to commandeer or regulate the price of other commodities, or to do with respect to them anything and everything which he may do in respect to food and fuels, so that in case of an emergency, which is likely to arise at any moment, we should have been in a position to properly defend ourselves in this war. There has got to be such a concentration of power, not only over foodstuffs and fuels but over everything which may enter into or be essential to the proper defense of our country and the proper waging of this war. This power has been stricken out contrary to my wishes, but I hope that other bills will be introduced taking care of the situation. They ought to be introduced at once and be passed; and if there is any division of opinion here upon the question of what effect this proposed legislation will have on the antitrust laws, let a bill be introduced embodying the Hollis amendment, and let it go through both Houses, as I think it will without much opposition. Then all uncertainty will be swept away.

But notwithstanding that this bill is not exactly as I would have it if I had the writing of it, it is necessary to pass this bill at once. We have listened to attacks on men, attacks on the administration, instead of what I think ought to be the prevailing sort of argument; that is, argument on the merits of the bill. I desire to speak for just a little while on the merits of this measure. The attacks that have been made here against Mr. Hoover are not, in my humble judgment, pertinent to the consideration of this bill. If Mr. Hoover does not fulfill his duties properly, the President has authority at any time to put somebody else in his place, and if that man does not fulfill the duties of the office the President has the right to supplant him.

I have no doubt that in the administration of the various laws and the new laws being put upon the statute books there will have to be a sifting process until the right man is found to occupy the right place. I do not think that is the case as to Mr. Hoover, although the fate of food administrators the world over has not been a happy one. Perhaps the trouble that has come to Mr. Hoover at the outset is the forerunner of what is going to be heaped upon his head before he gets through with this business. Certainly he has not received very much encouragement from this Chamber. I understand the effect of a good many of these speeches made here has been to discourage housekeepers in cooperating with Mr. Hoover. I understand that they have acted like a wet blanket on the proposition. Yet Mr. Hoover is a man of courage, a man of ability, and I look to see him push through the mists and throw off this load of opprobrium that has been heaped upon his head, and rise to the occasion as we have a right to expect of him and as the world expects of him.

No man can obtain the prominence of Mr. Hoover or earn the reputation he has earned in two years' time unless he has great merit; and when the world approves a man for what he has done I think it ill becomes his fellow citizens, upon mere suspicion or upon mere personal dislike or whatever it may be, to question not only his ability but his good faith and his general character and reputation.

I say that it seems to me that the attacks that have been made on Mr. Hoover have not alone hit Mr. Hoover but have hit the whole system and have hit the administration. It would be a bad thing, indeed, if it were not for the fact, as I have said before and as I repeat now, that, notwithstanding all the attacks that have been made upon the administration over the shoulders of some one else, these volleys have been deflected back against those who have fired the shots, and that the President to-day stands higher in the confidence of the people of the United States than any other one man who can be named. He is the man, after all, who has got to attend to this business; he is the man back of whom this country has got to mobilize its resources; he is the man back of whom we have got to put all of our punch and all of our strength; he is the man around whom the people can rally, and, notwithstanding, I say, all the attacks that have been made upon him, notwithstanding all the obstructions that have been laid in his path, he is the man around whom the people are going to rally; he is the man in whom they have confidence, and he is the man to whom the people want us to intrust this power.

It is a good thing that is so, because in a country like this we can not replace the President of the United States. He is the man whom the people elected last November; he is the man who, for good or ill, we have got to trust with the conduct of the war. I say the people knew their business when they elected him to that high office and not some one of the men who have been criticizing him so much. I think the people exercised a great deal of discretion and discrimination and wisdom in electing him President of the United States instead of one of those men who are criticizing him and who think they can run the country better than he can. It is easy to criticize, it is easy to attack, it is easy to shoot when you can not be shot at in return, but it is a far different thing when the responsibility is placed upon your own shoulders and when you are the man who has got to cast the deciding vote upon all these momentous questions.

If I understand the sentiment of the people of this country correctly or in the least apprehend what they are thinking, I say that they are not lying awake nights for fear of the power that is being put in the hands of the President or that may be put in his hands, but they are lying awake nights because they are afraid that Congress will not give the President of the United States the power that he needs to properly defend this country. I say it is ungenerous and unjust to attack him and to withhold from him power that he must have properly to conduct this great war and at the same time to put all the responsibility upon him for its successful outcome.

We are up against a dangerous situation in this country. I think, beyond any doubt, we are up against the most dangerous situation this country has been in since the Civil War. Either this country is going to be defeated or it is going to be victorious, and if it is defeated somebody is going to dictate the terms of peace, and that will not be us, but will be the man who has set the world on fire, the man who has been concocting plans for over a quarter of a century to ensnare the world, the man who is responsible for all the diabolical deeds that have been done in the three years that have elapsed, the man who is trying to dominate the world, the man who in three years of war has done things to which I do not believe the inventive genius and the diabolical cunning of Satan himself could have added anything.

If you read the history of this war and the things that have been done in the name of Germany, I say even Satan himself could not have added anything to the horror of it if he had exercised his most inventive genius. Devilishness has done its absolute worst. How would we like to have that kind of a man tell us, tell the people of this country, what we must and what we must not do? How would we like to have a taste of what Belgium, of what Roumania, of what France, of what other nations of the world have suffered at his hands? Yet we talk about these things and talk about our situation as though we were discussing a moot case, as though we were not concerned with a condition but were theorizing as to whether this thing or that thing is a nice thing, a pleasant thing for the people to have put upon them.

Nobody wants this war; nobody says this is a pleasant war, or that any wars are pleasant; nobody wants to have his business interfered with; nobody wants to be drafted and go to war; but we are in war, we have been shoved into it by the powers that are seeking to dominate this world, and the sole question is whether we are going to properly defend ourselves against that power. That is the only question. It is not a question as to whether the President should have autocratic power or powers that he ought not to enjoy in time of peace, but I say it comes right down to the question whether we want to be defeated or not, whether we want to win this war or not. If we want to win this war, and do not want somebody else's will to be imposed upon us, we must do the things that are necessary to be done to bring about the desired result. All other things, in my judgment, are irrelevant and immaterial as long as we confine our warfare within the bounds of moral and international law.

We are sending men to Europe. Thousands have already gone over there. Thousands may be on the way. Thousands and tens of thousands are still to go there. Do we lose all our interest in these troops, in the provisioning of these troops, when they go across there? Is not this matter here at home something that pertains to this war? Have not these men got to be provisioned? Have not they got to be provided with ammunition? Have not they got to be provided with guns? Have not they got to be provided with everything that is necessary to maintain an army? And if so, are we going to go back on these boys after they go across the sea and withhold or so delay our aid as to render our aid of no use and unavailing?

What must our men think when they go to Europe, braving not only the dangers of the submarine but braving the perils of the trenches, to go up against the worst that this world has ever known, and then see this Congress haggling and haggling about whether we ought to do this thing or that thing to help them?

This matter has been going on for six or seven weeks. What is our situation to-day? We have heard attacks, as I have said before, made on Mr. Hoover and made on the administration, but where are the attacks made on the men who are manipulating food prices and making it almost impossible for people to live, making their conditions almost intolerable? They are going right along. The harvest is on. The grain is cut. It is being hauled to the elevators. It is being bought and sold; and while this Congress has been talking about it the things which it was intended to reach are fast passing beyond its jurisdiction. If this bill does not become a law before next November, how can it affect the present conditions now or relieve them? And as we have delayed it two months, to that extent we have rendered it useless as to transactions already made.

The real situation we are in has not been discussed much. I want to repeat what I said not long ago, that you can not expect men to remain contented if they have to starve to death; and conditions are fast becoming such that in the time of the greatest prosperity this country has ever known the wage earner can not make both ends meet. Some of the wage earners are being taken and put in the trenches—some of those who will not ask for exemption, because they would rather fight and die for their country than beg to be left at home to take care of their families. Yet you are doing all of these things and are not raising your hand to help the people that are in actual distress; and that there is distress everybody knows.

I do not want to take up the time of the Senate by going over ground that I have been over before on this same question, but I want to say just a word on the coal question in the United States, and especially in the Northwest. It is not a question any more of months that we can consider this thing; it is a question of days. I have just returned from a trip to Wisconsin. I took occasion to look into our coal situation there. Our coal warehouses are empty. Milwaukee, I have been informed, has 70 per cent of its normal supply for this time of the year; but outside of Milwaukee the State has only a negligible percentage of its supply. We have our frosts early in September. We begin to heat our houses early in October. What are we going to do? We have not got any coal. When we inquire into the reasons why we have not got any coal, what do we find? We find that some people are afraid to buy now, because they have to pay $10 or $11 or $12 a ton for anthracite coal. The local coal dealer says he can not get any coal because there is no market. I saw letters—I wish I had them here, so that I could put them into the RECORD—from wholesale coal dealers to these local men, saying that they would only accept tentative contracts for coal; that they could not insure their getting their normal winter supply; that they would do the best they could. You go to the wholesale dealer, and he says that he has not got any orders, on the one hand, or says that he can not get cars to bring them to his docks on the other. You go to the coal operators, and they say that the railroads will not haul the coal. You go to the railroads, and they say that the coal operators are not bringing the coal, are not loading the cars; and do you know what is happening all this time? Thousands and thousands of tons of shipping are going up the Great Lakes empty.

We have great ore-carrying vessels that carry ore from Duluth to eastern ports, to Ohio ports, to Erie, Pa., and to Buffalo, N. Y., and ordinarily haul coal back again. These ore freighters probably can load 10,000 tons or more of ore. What are they doing? They carry ore from Duluth to the Lake ports I have mentioned, but are now going back empty to Superior. They are going back empty to Superior instead of hauling coal to the Northwest, and they are soon going to need it there. When you inquire into the reason why that is, these ship men say that the coal men do not furnish them any coal to carry. When you ask the railroad men they say that the coal men at the mines refuse to furnish coal to load the cars. When you go to the coal men they say that the railroads do not furnish the cars; and all the time what is happening? Why, the season is advancing, and next month, when the frost comes on and we have got to have coal to heat our houses, there will not be any coal in the Northwest. What will be the result then? The people will freeze in their houses unless drastic measures are taken at once to compel the coal to be sent out to the great Northwest, where it soon will be a necessity. Instead of getting coal when everyone knows it soon will be needed, the coal dealers and the coal operators and the railroads are engaged in a three-cornered debate as to the prices of coal and of transportation. Instead of delivering the goods, they are talking prices. Instead of trying to serve the public, they are thinking only of their own profit.

This is no exaggeration. This is a fact. I have taken occasion here for the last two or three days to go from one department to another to find out what can be done, and I am told that up to now they are helpless; that they have no power; that this bill is being held up, and that they are helpless to do anything. I went to the Council of National Defense and talked with one of the prominent men at its head, and he tells me that they are helpless to compel these boats or the coal men or the railroads, whoever is to blame, to ship coal into the Northwest. Now, let this talk go on a little longer, let this discussion go on just another month, and does anybody think that in the course of two or three weeks they can supply the great Northwest for this coming winter with anywhere near an adequate supply of coal?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. REED. Simply in the interest of accuracy—and I feel sure the Senator wants to be accurate——

Mr. HUSTING. I always try to be.

Mr. REED. I call his attention to the fact that this bill when it came to us contained practically no provision which would have enabled anything of a substantial character to be done with the coal mines; that it was during the discussion here in this Chamber that the Committee on Interstate Commerce took up that question, and that it was as a result of the discussions here and the investigations of that committee that the very strong and forceful provision regarding coal control was put into this measure; and it was put in so late, it came here so late in the discussion, that there was, I think, only one speech made in regard to it before the vote came.

Mr. HUSTING. That is undoubtedly correct, as the Senator says; but you want to remember that this food bill came up when the food situation was acute and not the coal situation, and I am sure that if the coal provision had not gotten in this bill it would have gotten in some other bill before this time, and probably would have passed long before this. But being in this bill, it remains inoperative until the bill is passed. I say this more for the purpose of bringing it to public attention, or as much for that purpose as to criticize the delay of the bill; but I am trying to show, in addition, the necessity of a bill of this kind.

I say that if this bill is delayed another three or four weeks, and we do not get relief in the Northwest, with a sufficient supply of coal to heat our houses, to say nothing about running the factories, just merely to keep people alive, how in the world can we in three or four weeks, in view of the congested conditions of transportation, hope to secure enough coal to keep us alive? How in the world can we expect to get coal into Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the two Dakotas, and perhaps farther to the west, in time to save the people from actually freezing to death?

It shows how helpless this Government is when it is in the clutches of men who run public utilities and coal mines, and things of that sort, for themselves as their private property. I just want to point that out in passing. I am not going to dwell on that; but it just shows that here is a great, big country, engaged in a war with a European power, unable to compel the people who have secured possession of our coal mines or the people who run our railroads, wherever the fault may be, to do something that will keep our people from starving or from freezing to death.

Does anybody think for a moment that it is going to avail us to send soldiers over to Europe to fight for this country and have our people killed here at home at the hands of our own citizens? Not only that, but do you think the people are going to stand it? Does anybody for a moment believe that people are going to starve to death and freeze to death and not call somebody to account either for the delays that have been interposed in this legislation, or call to account these men who are responsible for this condition—the private persons who are responsible for it?

There are two reasons, as I said before, for this condition. If this bill had been passed earlier it could have been put in operation earlier; but I am talking particularly to the point that we are in a position where we have got to have this power, where the selfish interests that are intent only on running their own business for private profit do not take into consideration the necessities of the hour and the needs of the people here with winter coming on.

Somebody is going to be called to account for this. People will not starve or freeze twice. If the food situation this next winter is worse than it was or worse than it has been, or the people are going to freeze in their own homes, these interests and people and men that are responsible for it will not only be called upon for an accounting, but they will never have a chance to do it again. They ought to take notice of this, because the people of this country will not tolerate such treatment.

If it shall be demonstrated here that if in times of plenty, when there is ample supply of fuel and plenty of coal in the ground, the present facilities for mining and selling and distribution amongst the people are going to fail us, that will be a demonstration, and a conclusive demonstration, of the absolute inability and impotence of the present agencies to do the work, and will quite equally demonstrate that they are no longer entitled to be trusted with those responsibilities and those duties. They will be taken away from them.

I say, not only for the purpose of this bill but for the purpose of similar bills that are shortly coming after, that it is enough that we have an outside enemy to fight without being distressed with this sort of situation here at home. Instead of everybody pulling together here to defeat the common enemy we have got to be engaged here in trying to save ourselves from our local troubles. I have mentioned some of them here. I refer to those men who are looking on and debating and debating the coal situation as to price, and talking and talking when we are staring the coming winter right in the face and know that unless coal is brought to our door our people will have to suffer. These troubles weaken the Government and strengthen our enemy.

I say that it seems to me that the administration is not getting the support it ought to get from Congress—not so much in the final result, because it so happens that everything that has been demanded eventually has been given to the administration; but it has been given slowly. It has been given grudgingly, distrustfully, sullenly, and all the time these grants of power have been opposed, have been attacked. There has been going out to the country a stream of cold water that is having its effect. It has not had its full effect because the people have confidence in their administration; but it is having a certain amount of effect in chilling the enthusiasm of the people and in raising in the people's minds distrust of their own Government.

Instead of attacking our foe, instead of pointing out to the people the dangers that we are in of being overwhelmed by this enemy—which, if it ever sets foot upon this soil will bring home to us the most terrible visitation that has ever been visited upon any people—instead of urging concerted effort and cooperation, I say this stream of influence has been going out and having only the effect of obstructing and discouraging the people and not of enthusing them. Why do not all of us try to inspire the people with faith and conviction instead of constantly trying to shake their faith and confidence in their Government? Why not try to cement our people together instead of tearing them apart? Why not encourage the President instead of trying our best to discourage him and distrust him?

Is that going to do any good? It is said that wholesome criticism is a good thing. Of course it is; but destructive criticism—criticism that is only aimed for the purpose of bringing the administration into disrepute—can have no good results. It can have only bad results; and why do we do it? Certainly there is no man in Congress that wants to see this country overwhelmed and defeated. Then why this constant attack? Why this constant obstruction against something that finally is going to be done anyway and is done?

I want to restate what I have said on numerous other occasions. It seems to me we have got all the trouble in fighting the men who are seeking our undoing at the outset. I do not charge any Senator with willful misconduct or question his motives. He doubtless has good reasons for what he is doing and saying, but I can not for the life of me understand why Congress or the people of the United States want to concern themselves with anything in this hour other than to defeat the enemy. Clearly with us the issue is the autocracy or the democracy of the world. The issue is our independence, our democracy as well. So it is not a question of whether you are in favor of the food bill or against it as a general proposition. If it is necessary, then its passage involves the question whether you are in favor of democracy or autocracy, because that is going to be the effect of this war. Either autocracy is going to be enthroned in the world or democracy is going to be established. That is as clear as crystal, as clear as day.

It does not make any difference any longer why this happened or that happened. It does not make any difference how some looked at one or the other of the issues antedating the war. The question now is simply and purely, Are you in favor of autocracy or are you in favor of the democracy of the world? Are you in favor of the United States or are you in favor of Germany? Are you in favor of supporting this administration to defeat Germany or are you going to do all you can to obstruct, hinder, and delay this country in defeating Germany? That there should be differences of opinion on matters of legislation, of course, is inevitable, but it only ought to be in such manner as not to obstruct something that is a crying need, for we have about the biggest job on our hands we have ever undertaken as a Nation. It will require not only all the physical forces that we can muster but all the moral forces, spiritual forces, we can muster to win this war. Whoever fails to give his moral support to his country in times like this, whether in private or public life, has assumed a heavy responsibility. The people whom we are fighting are united. Germany is united to a man. Are we going to be less united? In preparing for war, time is of the very essence. Delays are dangerous always, but in war times often fatal. Germany owes a debt of gratitude to her enemies for their delays. Are we going to make the same mistakes that were made by Germany's foes in Europe, always to get there just a little bit too late?

There are two ways by which we can defeat ourselves. One is by not mobilizing our forces at all; the other is by mobilizing our forces too late. If we do not get a million soldiers over there before Germany gets 2,000,000 soldiers more under arms, we are not accomplishing anything; but if we get our forces there before she can mobilize any additional forces—or, rather, before time can mobilize for her any more forces by the growing up of her young men into military age—that is the way we can defeat Germany. We can not defeat her by holding back and by not getting started just as quickly as we can. We can only defeat her by increasing the allied forces in a greater measure than Germany does hers.

I am speaking not only for this bill but for bills that may come hereafter.

In fact, there is only one thing for any man to determine for himself, and that is whether this war ought to be won or lost. If it is not to be lost, every man has got to do his duty, and the affairs of this country have got to be put in the hands of a man who can deliver the punch. It has got to be done quickly. It has got to be done with all the forces—physical, spiritual, and moral—which we can bring in order to rescue the world from the danger that has been hanging over at least the Eastern Hemisphere for three years. If we do not do that, we shall have to answer to posterity, we shall have to answer to history, and if anyone is in part even responsible for that result he has indeed a heavy responsibility to be accountable for.

This country ought to be united; it ought to be united to a man. These insidious influences that have been at work here have been at work in Russia and have torn Russia all to pieces. The deplorable condition of Russia to-day is due to the same influences that started to divide our people in this country, and those forces are working day and night in this country now. The pity of it is that they find oftentimes instruments here in this country with which to carry on their nefarious and treasonable work. If this influence is not stamped out in this country, even though we issue successfully out of this war, if it is not exterminated, it will yet keep on and tend to divide our people permanently. We have influences here in the United States that are doing the Kaiser's work for him, forces that started 30 years ago and are at work here to-day. They have been enabled through the press and through organizations, old and new, political and nonpolitical, sectarian and nonsectarian, to set our people one against the other and against their own Government.

Those forces ought to be hunted down and exterminated, because if they are not exterminated they will have to be dealt with after the war is over. Last fall we all knew that many crawled on their hands and knees to curry their favor and to get their votes, and the chances are they will do it again if it is deemed politically expedient to do so. These forces that are more German than American, that find nothing good in our Government and nothing bad in that of our enemies, ought to reap the opprobrium they so justly earned and be brought into such disrepute that decent men, yes, decent politicians, would shun them like the pest.

Now, we can not afford to have any division in this country. If any substantial portion of the people of this country are divided from the Government, we shall have to pay the penalty. The way we can bring this war to a speedy end is for the people to unite together on one purpose, one supreme purpose, the supreme purpose of the hour. If they do that, no American need fear the consequences.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I think it is eminently unfortunate that Senators can not discuss the merits or demerits of any particular measure without imputing improper motives to those who happen to differ from them. Personalities are always objectionable in discussion and indicate a weakness in the speaker or want of merit in the measure which he advocates. Sometimes it is both. In answer to any intimation that I have been a party to a scheme to delay, prevent, or postpone the final vote on any measure I can say that I have probably spent less time on my feet in the Senate than any other Member of this body who attends upon its deliberations as regularly as I do. Any suggestion, therefore, of that kind is utterly devoid of truth. It is not my proper function to animadvert upon the conduct of other Senators. They are doubtless doing that which their sense of obligation to their constituents and the country generally demands that they should do, and doing it quite as well as I could do it. But I do want to say that I am nauseated with this pharasaical noise that we hear upon the floor of the Senate too often that somebody or some Senator is withholding from the President of the United States the support which the President should have if this war is to be brought to a successful termination. As a matter of fact, I suspect the patriotism of a man who feels called upon to impute bad motives to somebody else in order to prove the good motives which actuate him. The man who undertakes to make out somebody else a sinner in order to prove himself a saint will bear watching. I think if there was more attention paid to the golden rule in senatorial discussion we would do more work and better work and do it in less time.

Mr. President, I was very much pleased on yesterday when the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] secured unanimous consent to vote upon this conference report at 4 o'clock this afternoon. This question has been thoroughly discussed, every phase adequately considered, and I think the time has arrived when the matter ought to be disposed of finally. I am going to vote for the conference report, not because I approve everything that has been done or everything that the report contains, but for the reason that I believe it is the best that can be hoped for in the circumstances.

I confess that I was somewhat disappointed when the conferees on the part of the Senate found that they were unable to induce the conferees on the part of the House to insert certain amendments that they did not return to the Senate for instructions instead of going to the Executive for absolution from their senatorial obligations.

But that is in accord with the custom prevailing in Washington to-day in matters touching legislation. It is a melancholy fact that that pride in the independence of the legislative department of the Government which was so splendidly manifested by Senators in days gone by is no longer observable in this Chamber. Really, to show independence of executive domination often subjects a Senator to the criticism at the hands of the servile and sycophantic self-constituted censors as being disloyal to the Government

Mr. President, this bill, I am afraid, is going to be disappointing both to its proponents and those opposing it. I hope it will prove a disappointment to those who doubt its merit.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator referred to the proposition that the Senate conferees should have returned to the Senate for instructions. I wish to say to the Senator that the conferees on the part of the Senate endeavored to do that. The bill and the papers were in the hands of the House conferees. The parliamentary situation was such that the Senate conferees could not return to the Senate for instructions without the consent of the House conferees. That they refused to give.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am very glad to have that statement from the able Senator, because I think it is well for the Senate to preserve somewhat its constitutional independence and dignity and to maintain its rights as a coordinate branch of the Government. It so rarely does anything of that kind that I am delighted to have the assurances of the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Do I understand the Senator correctly to say that when the Senate appoints conferees those conferees can not return to the body which appointed them without the consent of the House conferees?

Mr. KENYON. As I understand the parliamentary situation the Senate requested the conference. The House thereupon sent the bill to conference. The matter was in their hands. I know I asked permission to go back to the Senate for instructions as to the amendment relative to the war committee, and it was the unanimous sentiment that we could not do it, and parliamentarians in the Senate, I understand, so hold.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not pretend to be a parliamentarian, but I am astounded that anybody should think that the agents of the Senate can not use their own judgment to walk out of the room if they desire before yielding or coming to a conclusion on any matters submitted to the conference committee, and can not come back to the Senate and get the views of the Senate as to whether they should yield or not.

Mr. NELSON. I think, if the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, the trouble grows out of this situation: The bill being in the possession of the House, necessarily the first action on the conference report would have to be taken there. Until the House acted it could not come back here to be acted upon at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree entirely with the Senator that there could have been no conference report made here before it was made in the House. That is not what I am asking.

Mr. NELSON. For that reason the Senate conferees were handicapped in the manner the Senator from Iowa has stated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They may have thought that they were handicapped, but the Senate conferees could certainly have walked out of that conference room, having said to the House conferees, "Gentlemen, you are asking us to yield on all these points. We do not feel like doing it without consulting the body that instructed us. We will go back and submit it to them and meet with you later." There is nothing that could possibly have prevented that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is no doubt about the view of the honorable Senator from Connecticut being correct. In my judgment there were two ways open to the conferees. They could either refuse to concur and come back to the Senate for direction or they could have gone on and depended upon the Senate to reject the conference report if they disapproved it. That was not done, but I am glad to know that all the conferees on the part of the Senate were not in favor of supine acquiescence in the Executive order. Some little sense of independence is better than nothing. Mr. President, I shall not delay action upon this measure or consume the time which other Senators may desire in discussing the bill. I am not one of those favoring the bill who insist on taking all the time that should be devoted to discussing the merits or demerits of the measure in criticism of some Senator who may oppose the bill. I think it is unfortunate to delay action upon a measure in an effort to pick flaws in somebody else with the manifest purpose of proving loyalty to the administration by undertaking to show that some other Senator is disloyal. I desire action upon this bill at the earliest possible moment. I expect to vote for it, but I fear it is going to be a disappointment, a sad disappointment, to the people who are expecting some relief from it.

After listening to the speech of the able and patriotic Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I came to the conclusion that John Law, at the high tide of his influence in France in 1719, never promised more to the people of France with his famous "Mississippi scheme" and accomplished less in their behalf than the administrator of this law will be able to give to the people of the United States. I am afraid that the luscious fruit held out to the hungry will turn to ashes upon the famishing lips of the people. But the people are hoping and demanding something. They are hungry; poverty stares them in the face. They desire that something shall be done in their behalf. War conditions are unbearable. Of course I know it is not within the power of Congress to give them what they want; but, I repeat, they want something; they need something; they are hoping for something; and if we shall be guilty of a little economic bread-pill therapeutics, which we are doing when we enact this law, I am sure the people will pardon us under the circumstances. God knows I would that we had the power to give the people what they need.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think that during the course of this debate I should say a few words and put in the RECORD some matters relating to a subject which has been alluded to in the course of the debate, although perhaps not very germane to any of the provisions of this food-control bill. The matter relates to the construction of the military cantonments, and was first referred to by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] day before yesterday, and by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in his able discussion yesterday. The Senator from Illinois, as I understood him, criticized the Government or the War Department for some extravagance and waste in the matter of letting the contracts, in the employment of labor, and in the purchase of material used in the building of the several cantonments.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Would the Senator from South Dakota be good enough to designate the Senator from Illinois to whom he alludes? I know that my colleague does not shirk the responsibility and I desire to have him designate him.

Mr. STERLING. I allude to Senator SHERMAN, the colleague of the Senator now on the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not care to be confused as to my views on those particular subjects.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from New York, in his discussion yesterday, did not criticize the department or the Government for any waste or extravagance, but that which he sought to criticize in regard to cantonment construction was the secrecy with which the work was done, the contracts let, and so forth. He rightly thought more publicity in this respect, as well as in the exercise of the powers conferred by the food-control bill, would inspire greater confidence on the part of the people.

Mr. President, in regard to the construction of these cantonments, I heard two months ago, more or less, of individual criticism of the methods of the Government in letting contracts for such construction, costing, as is estimated, nearly $90,000,000, and I have seen statements in the newspapers to the effect that the Government was paying extravagant wages and extravagant prices for material that entered into the building of these cantonments. Having that in view, and desiring to know, so far as could be known, the facts, on June 15 I introduced a resolution—Senate resolution 85—which I ask may at this point in my remarks be printed in the RECORD, so that it may appear in close connection with the answer of the Secretary of War, which I shall next present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to at once make inquiry and investigation as to buildings constructed, or to be constructed, at the various cantonments lately designated and established on the order or approval of the Secretary of War throughout the United States for the mobilization of troops, and that such inquiry relate to the following:

First. The kind and character of buildings constructed or to be constructed at such cantonments, including the material entering into such construction.

Second. The estimated cost of such construction at each of the various cantonments.

Third. The nature and basis of the contract or contracts entered or to be entered into by the War Department for such construction and the guaranties for the performance thereof by contractors, together with the basis of compensation for such contractors.

Fourth. The wages or compensation paid per diem or otherwise to carpenters and mechanics engaged in such construction as compared with the usual and ordinary wages for like labor or services.

Fifth. The price paid for material used in such construction as compared with the average market price of like material.

And that said committee make such investigation and report thereon to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, my resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and by that committee was referred to the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War has made answer, and by the permission of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator in charge of the pending bill, I have here the answer of the Secretary of War, with liberty to use and make it public. I ask to have it read for the purpose of doing justice to the Secretary of War and his management of this important work and for the information of everybody concerned. I send to the Secretary's desk first the letter of the Secretary of War, of date July 26, and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 26, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: In compliance with your request of the 18th instant that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs be furnished with any information relating to Senate resolution 85, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, that may be in the possession of the War Department, the following report is submitted, the inquiries being answered in their order:

First. At each of the 16 cantonments for the National Army there are now being constructed approximately from 1,000 to 1,250 buildings, varying in size from 43 feet by 140 feet to 14 feet by 14 feet. About one-half of the buildings are of the larger size. Some of these buildings are two-story, the balance are one-story. They are being constructed of wood, and will be roofed with felt patent roofing.

Second. The estimated average approximate cost of the cantonments is $5,600,000. The largest cantonment is at Fort Riley, Kans., and is intended for 46,000 men, and its estimated approximate cost is $6,400,000; the smallest is at Battle Creek, Mich., intended for 36,000 men, and its estimated approximate cost is $4,900,000. In this estimated cost is included the clearing of the land, building of barracks, officers' quarters, storehouses, laundries, stables, railroads, highways, streets, power plants, refrigerators, ice plants, plumbing system, steam-heating system, garbage incinerators, surface draining system, fire-protection appliances, stoves for heating, ranges for cooking, cots, and matresses. In fact, each cantonment will be a complete city for a population of 40,000 people, with all facilities, plants, and appliances required by modern living conditions.

Third. Submitted herewith is a copy of the form of contract which has been made with each of the contractors for cantonment construction. Practically all of the work, with the exception of roads, at each cantonment has been awarded to a single contractor. The guaranty of performance is contained in the bond required by article 9 of the contract.

Fourth. The contract provides that the contractor shall make no departure from the standard rate of wages paid as of June 1, 1917, in the locality where the work is being done without the prior consent and approval of the contracting officer.

In some cases it has been found necessary, in order to secure the large number of carpenters and mechanics required and to induce them to leave their homes and undertake this rush work, to pay a slight advance over the locally prevailing union rate of wage. Annexed hereto is a paper which shows the wages being paid at the cantonments and the locally prevailing rates of wages as of June 1, 1917, in so far as this office has been able to secure information of such rates.

Fifth. The largest item of material entering into the cantonment construction is, of course, the lumber. Upon the advice of the lumber committee of the munitions board of the Council of National Defense a contract was entered into with eight lumbermen's emergency bureaus, located in various lumber-producing sections of the United States, under which a scale of prices was fixed, which averaged $20 a thousand for southern pine and $22 a thousand for North Carolina pine, about 80 per cent of all of the lumber required being of those kinds. Northern hemlock and fir make up the balance of the lumber required. Under the contract the price for northern hemlock is the same as the price for southern pine, with freight charges added, and fir at the rate of $16 or $17 per thousand feet.

These prices are considerably lower than it is possible to obtain similar lumber for in the open market. Where it has been found necessary to purchase smaller quantities of lumber locally in the open market for the immediate construction of temporary buildings required for administration and other purposes at the cantonment sites, the contractors have been forced to pay as high as $42 per thousand feet for southern pine and North Carolina pine.

Plumbing supplies required for the cantonments have been contracted for through a large central firm—Crane & Co., of Chicago—who manufacture some of such supplies, and who have undertaken to have manufactured by other manufacturers such other plumbing supplies as are required for the work. The prices stipulated in the contract are considerably lower than the prevailing prices for similar material. At the time the arrangement was made with the Crane Co. it was necessary to induce manufacturers to make many of the articles required, particularly the pottery, and such orders had to be given in advance and scattered throughout the country to the various manufacturers thereof.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the Secretary of War in his letter refers to certain statements and tables relative to the union rate of wages at or near the places of these several cantonments during the years 1916 and 1917. I have those tables before me; I shall not attempt to give them at length, or to have them inserted at length in the RECORD. The tables give the union wage scale for carpenters, for building laborers, for plumbers, and for inside wiremen—electricians—for 1916 and 1917—partially, I will say, for the year 1917—at or near the locality at which each cantonment is to be built.

Thus for Fort Riley, Kans., the wage scale at Kansas City, Mo., and Fort Leavenworth, Kans., is given; for Fort Snelling, Minn., the wage scale for Minneapolis and St. Paul is given; and so on through the entire list of 16 cantonments, one or two places near the cantonment being taken from which to ascertain the union wage scale paid for these various occupations. The wage scale, as I said, is complete for the year 1916, but not complete for 1917. However, when given for 1917 the wage scale shows generally a material increase over the wage scale of 1916.

For carpenters the wage scale of 1916 runs from 32½ cents an hour at Petersburg, Va., to 65 cents an hour at Kansas City; 70 cents an hour at Chicago, Ill.; 62½ cents an hour at Salt Lake City, and the same at San Francisco. I recall that on yesterday the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] referred to what the Government was paying for the construction of cantonments at Rockford. I think the average for carpenters employed at or near the places of the several cantonments would be not far from 55 cents an hour for 1916, and, so far as the table shows, from 65 to 67½ cents an hour for 1917. The number of hours per day is usually eight.

For building laborers the wages for 1916 run from 22$\frac{7}{10}$ cents an hour at Louisville, Ky., to 62½ cents an hour at San Francisco, Cal., which is an extreme. A fair average, I think, or an estimated average, for this class of workmen for 1916 is from 37½ cents to 40 cents an hour. In nearly all cases the hours per day are eight. I think in about three, perhaps four, places the hours are nine hours per day.

For plumbers the 1916 wage scale runs from 44.4 cents an hour at Atlanta Ga., to 75 cents an hour at Kansas City, Salt Lake, Portland, San Francisco, Seattle, and at Chicago. I think the average would be from 67½ to 70 cents an hour.

The 1917 wage scale for that class of workmen shows material increases, so far as that scale is carried out. Thus, at Salt Lake plumbers are paid, in 1917, 81.3 cents an hour, the same at Seattle, and the average wage scale for places near the 16 cantonments, I think, would be about from 72½ to 75 cents an hour, and the hours per day are invariably eight for the plumbers.

The wages of inside wiremen, according to the 1916 wage scale, run from 37½ cents an hour at Grand Rapids, Mich., which is extremely low—the wages at that place being 45 cents an hour for 1917—to 75 cents at Chicago, which is extremely high. The next highest, 65 cents an hour, was paid at Kansas City. The average is 57½ cents an hour. So far as given, the scale for 1917 shows an increase; that at Boston, Mass., amounting to 62½ cents an hour in 1916 and 71.3 cents in 1917. Seattle shows an increase from 62½ cents to 75 cents an hour; Baltimore, from 43.8 cents to 58 cents an hour. That is as far, Mr. President, as I have sought to analyze the tables submitted by the Secretary of War.

In addition to these tables showing the union wage scale, the Secretary of War submits, under the head of "Labor data—National Army cantonments," a statement of what is being paid to the various classes of employees for the building of these cantonments. I have not compared them at length, but I take Ayer, Mass., for example. The wage scale for carpenters at Boston in 1916 was 57 cents an hour and in 1917 65 cents an hour. I find that the Government is now paying carpenters 65 cents an hour at Ayer, Mass., for cantonment work. Plumbers at Boston, Mass., in 1916 were paid 65 cents an hour; in 1917, 68.8 cents per hour; and the Government is now paying 68¾ cents an hour at Ayer. For electricians or inside wiremen at Boston, Mass., there was paid in 1916 62½ cents an hour, and in 1917, according to the union wage scale, 71.3 cents per hour; but the Government is now paying 70 cents at Ayer. For laborers the Government is paying now in Ayer, Mass., 37½ cents an hour.

So, Mr. President, it occurs to me that this, under the conditions, is not a bad showing on the part of the Government. I assume the employees are able to do a full day's work in their several lines, or that they are as good as the average.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I was out of the Chamber when the Senator began his address. I desire to ask him if he has the form of contract which has been entered into for the building of cantonments at various places?

Mr. STERLING. I have the form of contract here, I will say to the Senator, and I intend putting part of it in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it provide that the contractors shall be paid 10 per cent of what it costs to do the work?

Mr. STERLING. Not 10 per cent, but varying rates of per cent according to the cost. The contractors are paid, as a usual thing, a rate according to the cost of construction of the cantonment, but in no case to exceed more than $250,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Are the persons employed at the prices the Senator is now stating working for the Government or for the contractors?

Mr. STERLING. They are working primarily for the contractors. The contractors employ them.

Mr. NORRIS. What means does the Government take in order to prevent the contractor from increasing the expense, so that thereby he may increase his profits?

Mr. STERLING. The contract itself provides that the scale or rate of wages shall be the same as wages for the same kind of work in that locality or community, except where, under special circumstances, the Government contractor may pay a slightly higher rate of wages, and, according to a letter from the Secretary of War, which was read at the desk a little while ago, in answer to this resolution of inquiry, they have in a few instances, I think, paid a slightly higher rate than the going rate of wages.

For building laborers at Boston, Mass., in 1916, 35 cents an hour was paid. The figures are not given for 1917, but the Government is paying 37½ cents an hour for such laborers at Ayer, Mass. I will not take time, Mr. President, to go further into this statement of what is being paid these several classes of employees at these 16 cantonments, but I will ask that it may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission will be granted.

Mr. STERLING. I will simply say, Mr. President, that I thought it no more than fair and just that this matter, about which there has been a good deal of talk, a good deal of newspaper comment, and a good deal of criticism, too, should be stated here on the floor of the Senate, and that the version of the Secretary of War as to what is actually being done, and as to the cost of labor and materials, should be made public.

I now refer to the contract under which all this work is being done. There is first a long preamble reciting the necessity, as it were, for entering into these contracts. Then comes article 1, entitled "Extent of the work"; article 2, entitled "Cost of the work"; article 3, "Determination of fee"; article 4, "Payments"; article 5, "Inspection and audit"; article 6, "Special requirements"; article 7, "Right to terminate contract"; article 8, "Abandonment of work by contracting officer"; article 9, "Bond"; article 10, "Convict labor"; article 11, "Hours and conditions of labor"; article 12, "Right to transfer or sublet"; article 13, "No participation in profits by Government officials"; article 14, "Settlement of disputes"; and article 15, providing that this contract shall bind and inure to the contractor and its successors. I will read the remainder of article 15:

It is understood and agreed that wherever the words "contracting officer" are used herein the same shall be construed to include his successor in office, any other person to whom the duties of the contracting officer may be assigned by the Secretary of War, and any duly appointed representative of the contracting officer.

Then there is the place for signatures.

Mr. President, I wish to have printed in the RECORD article 2——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STERLING. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator have the entire contract printed?

Mr. STERLING. I can, Mr. President, have the entire contract printed if desired.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it ought to be all printed.

Mr. STERLING. I thought it a little lengthy, and I thought these two articles were of special interest. Very well, then, I will ask that the entire contract be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONTRACT FOR EMERGENCY WORK.

CONSTRUCTION OF ———.

Contract made and concluded this — day of ———, 1917, by and between ——— ———, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of ———, represented by ——— ———, its president, party of the first part (hereinafter called contractor) and the United States of America, by Maj. W. A. Dempsey, Q. M. U. S. R. (hereinafter called contracting officer), acting by authority of the Secretary of War, party of the second part.

Whereas the Congress having declared by joint resolution, approved April 6, 1917, that war exists between the United States of America and Germany, a national emergency exists, and the United States urgently requires the immediate performance of the work hereinafter described, and it is necessary that said work shall be completed within the shortest possible time; and

Whereas it is advisable under the disturbed conditions which exist in the contracting industry throughout the country for the United States to depart from the usual procedure in the matter of letting contracts and adopt means that will insure the most expeditious results; and

Whereas the contractor has had experience in the execution of similar work, has an organization suitable for the performance of such work, and is ready to undertake the same upon the terms and conditions herein provided: Now therefore

This contract witnesseth, That in consideration of the premises and of the payments to be made as hereinafter provided the contractor hereby covenants and agrees to and with the contracting officers as follows:

ARTICLE I.

Extent of the work: The contractor shall, in the shortest possible time, furnish the labor, materials, tools, machinery, equipment, facilities, and supplies, and do all things necessary for the construction and completion of the following work: in accordance with the drawings and specifications to be furnished by the contracting officer, and subject in every detail to his supervision, direction, and instruction.

The contracting officer may, from time to time, by written instructions or drawings issued to the contractor, make changes in said drawings and specifications, issue additional instructions, require additional work, or direct the omission of work previously ordered, and the provisions of this contract shall apply to all such changes, modifications, and additions with the same effect as if they were embodied in the original drawings and specifications. The contractor shall comply with all such written instructions or drawings.

The title to all work completed or in course of construction shall be in the United States; and upon delivery at the site of the work, and upon inspection and acceptance in writing by the contracting officer, all machinery, equipment, hand tools, supplies, and materials, for which the contractor shall be entitled to be reimbursed under paragraph (a) of Article II hereof, shall become the property of the United States. These provisions as to title shall not operate to relieve the contractor from any duties imposed hereby or by the contracting officer.

ARTICLE II.

Cost of the work: The contractor shall be reimbursed in the manner hereinafter described for such of its actual net expenditures in the performance of said work as may be approved or ratified by the contracting officer and as are included in the following items:

(a) All labor, material, machinery, hand tools not owned by the workmen, supplies and equipment, necessary for either temporary or permanent use for the benefit of said work; but this shall not be construed to cover machinery or equipment mentioned in section (c) of this article. The contractor shall make no departure from the standard rate of wages being paid in the locality where said work is being done without the prior consent and approval of the contracting officer.

(b) All subcontracts made in accordance with the provisions of this agreement.

(c) Rentals actually paid by the contractor, at rates not to exceed those mentioned in the schedule of rental rates hereto attached, for construction plant in sound and workable condition, such as pumps, derricks, concrete mixers, boilers, clam-shell or other buckets, electric motors, electric drills, electric hammers, electric hoists, steam shovels, locomotive cranes, power saws, engineers' levels and transits, and such other equipment as may be necessary for the proper and economical prosecution of the work.

Rental to the contractor for such construction plant or parts thereof as it may own and furnish, at the rates mentioned in the schedule of rental rates hereto attached, except as hereinafter set forth. When such construction plant or any part thereof shall arrive at the site of the work, the contractor shall file with the contracting officer a schedule setting forth the fair valuation at that time of each part of such construction plant. Such valuation shall be deemed final unless the contracting officer shall, within five days after the machinery has been set up and is working, modify or change such valuation, in which event the valuation so made by the contracting officer shall be deemed final. When and if the total rental paid to the contractor for any such part shall equal the valuation thereof, no further rental therefor shall be paid to the contractor and title thereto shall vest in the United States. At the completion of the work the contracting officer may, at his option, purchase for the United States any part of such construction plant then owned by the contractor by paying to the contractor the difference between the valuation of such part or parts and the total rentals theretofore paid therefor.

Rates of rental as substitutes for such scheduled rental rates may be agreed upon in writing between the contractor and the contracting officer, such rates to be in conformity with rates of rental charged in the particular territory in which the work covered by this contract is to be performed. If the contracting officer shall furnish or supply any such equipment, the contractor shall not be allowed any rental therefor and shall receive no fee for the use of such equipment.

(d) Loading and unloading such construction plant, the transportation thereof to and from the place or places where it is to be used in connection with said work subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth, the installation and dismantling thereof, and ordinary repairs and replacements during its use in the said work.

(e) Transportation and expenses to and from the work of the necessary field forces for the economical and successful prosecution of the work, procuring labor and expediting the production and transportation of material and equipment.

(f) Salaries of resident engineers, superintendents, timekeepers, foremen, and other employees at the field offices of the contractor in connection with said work. In case the full time of any field employee of the contractor is not applied to said work but is divided between said work and other work, his salary shall be included in this item only in proportion to the actual time applied to this work.

(g) Buildings and equipment required for necessary field offices, commissary, and hospital and the cost of maintaining and operating said offices, commissary, and hospital, including such minor expenses as telegrams, telephone service, expressage, postage, etc.

(h) Such bonds, fire, liability, and other insurance as the contracting officer may approve or require; and such losses and expenses, not compensated by insurance or otherwise, as are found and certified by the contracting officer to have been actually sustained (including settlements made with the written consent and approval of the contracting officer) by the contractor in connection with said work, and to have clearly resulted from causes other than the fault or neglect of the contractor. Such losses and expenses shall not be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of determining the contractor's fee. The cost of reconstructing and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reimbursement to the contractor, but not for the purpose of determining the contractor's fee, except as hereinafter provided.

(i) Permit fees, deposits, royalties, and other similar items of expense incidental to the execution of this contract, and necessarily incurred. Expenditures under this item must be approved in advance by the contracting officer.

(j) Such proportion of the transportation, traveling, and hotel expenses of officers, engineers, and other employees of the contractor as is actually incurred in connection with this work.

(k) Such other items as should in the opinion of the contracting officer be included in the cost of the work. When such an item is allowed by the contracting officer, it shall be specifically certified as being allowed under this paragraph.

The United States reserves the right to pay directly to common carriers any or all freight charges on material of all kinds and machinery furnished under this contract and certified by the contracting officer as being for installation or for consumption in the course of the work hereunder; the contractor shall be reimbursed for such freight charges of this character as it shall pay and as shall be specifically certified by the contracting officer: but the contractor shall have no fee based on such expenditures. Freight charges paid by the contractor for transportation of construction equipment, construction plant, tools and supplies of every character, shall be treated as part of the cost of the work upon which the contractor's fee shall be based, provided that charges for transportation of such construction equipment, construction plant, and tools over distances in excess of 500 miles shall require the special approval of the contracting officer.

No salaries of the contractor's executive officers, no part of the expense incurred in conducting the contractor's main office, or regularly established branch office, and no overhead expenses of any kind, except as specifically listed above, shall be included in the cost of the work; nor shall any interest on capital employed or on borrowed money be included in the cost of the work.

The contractor shall take advantage to the extent of its ability of all discounts available, and when unable to take such advantage shall promptly notify the contracting officer of its inability and its reasons therefor.

All revenue from the operations of the commissary, hospital, or other facilities, or from rebates, refunds, etc., shall be accounted for by the contractor and applied in reduction of the cost of the work.

ARTICLE III.

Determination of fee: As full compensation for the services of the contractor, including profit and all general overhead expense, except as herein specifically provided, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor in the manner hereinafter prescribed a fee to be determined at the time of completion of the work from the following schedule, except as hereinafter otherwise provided:

If the cost of the work is under $100,000 a fee of 10 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $100,000 and under $125,000 a fee of $10,000.

If the cost of the work is over $125,000 and under $250,000 a fee of 8 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $250,000 and under $266,666.67 a fee of $20,000.

If the cost of the work is over $266,666.67 and under $500,000 a fee of 7½ per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $500,000 and under $535,714.29 a fee of $37,500.

If the cost of the work is over $535,714.29 and under $3,000,000 a fee of 7 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $3,000,000 and under $3,500,000 a fee of $210,000.

If the cost of the work is over $3,500,000 a fee of 6 per cent of such cost.

Provided, however, That the fee upon such part of the cost of the work as is represented by payments to subcontractors under subdivision (b) above shall in each of the above contingencies be 5 per cent and no more of the amount of such part of the cost.

The cost of materials purchased or furnished by the contracting officer for said work, exclusive of all freight charges thereon, shall be included in the cost of the work for the purpose of reckoning such fee to the contractor, but for no other purpose.

The fee for reconstructing and replacing any of the work destroyed or damaged shall be such percentage of the cost thereof—not exceeding 7 per cent—as the contracting officer may determine.

The total fee to the contractor hereunder shall in no event exceed the sum of $250,000, anything in this agreement to the contrary notwithstanding.

ARTICLE IV.

Payments: On or about the 7th day of each month the contracting officer and the contractor shall prepare a statement showing as completely as possible: (1) The cost of the work up to and including the last day of the previous month, (2) the cost of the materials furnished by the contracting officer up to and including such last day, and (3) an amount equal to 3½ per cent, except as herein otherwise provided, of the sum of (1) and (2) on account of the contractor's fee; and the contractor at such time shall deliver to the contracting officer original signed pay rolls for labor, original invoices for materials purchased, and all other original papers not theretofore delivered supporting expenditures claimed by the contractor to be included in the cost of the work. If there be any item or items entering into such statement upon which the contractor and the contracting officer can not agree, the decision of the contracting officer as to such disputed item or items shall govern. The contracting officer shall then pay to the contractor on or about the 9th day of each month the cost of the work mentioned in (1) and the fee mentioned in (3) of such statement, less all previous payments. When the statement above mentioned includes any work of reconstructing and replacing work destroyed or damaged, the payment on account of the fee in (3) for such reconstruction and replacement work shall be computed at such rate, not exceeding 3½ per cent, as the contracting officer may determine. The statement so made and all payments made thereon shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, except as provided in Article XIV hereof. The contracting officer may also make payments at more frequent intervals for the purpose of enabling the contractor to take advantage of discounts at intervals between the dates above mentioned or for other lawful purposes. Upon final completion of said work the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as determined under Articles II and III hereof.

ARTICLE V.

Inspection and audit: The contracting officer shall at all times be afforded proper facilities for inspection of the work and shall at all times have access to the premises, to the work and material, and to all books, records, correspondence, instructions, plans, drawings, receipts, vouchers, and memoranda of every description of the contractor pertaining to said work; and the contractor shall preserve for a period of two years after its completion or cessation of work under this contract all the books, records, and other papers just mentioned. Any duly authorized representative of the contractor shall be accorded the privilege of examining the books, records, and papers of the contracting officer relating to said work for the purpose of checking up and verifying the cost of said work. The system of accounting to be employed by the contractor shall be such as is satisfactory to the contracting officer.

If at any time the contracting officer shall find that bills for labor, material, or other bills legitimately incurred by the contractor hereunder are not promptly paid by the contractor, the contracting officer may, in his discretion, refuse to make further payments to the contractor until all such obligations past due shall have been paid. Should the contractor neglect or refuse to pay such bills within five days after notice from the contracting officer so to do, then the contracting officer shall have the right to pay such bills directly, in which event such direct payments shall not be included in the cost of the work.

ARTICLE VI.

Special requirements: The contractor hereby agrees that it will—

(a) Begin the work herein specified at the earliest time practicable and diligently proceed so that such work may be completed at the earliest possible date.

(b) Promptly pay for all labor, material, or other service rendered.

(c) Procure and thereafter maintain such insurance in such forms and in such amounts and for such periods of time as the contracting officer may approve or require.

(d) Procure all necessary permits and licenses and obey and abide by all laws, regulations, ordinances, and other rules applying to such work of the United States of America, of the State or Territory wherein such work is done, of any subdivision thereof, or of any duly constituted public authority.

(e) Unless this provision is waived by the contracting officer, insert in every contract made by it for the furnishing to it of services, materials, supplies, machinery, and equipment, or the use thereof, for the purposes of the work hereunder, a provision that such contract is assignable to the United States; will make all such contracts in its own name, and will not bind or purport to bind the United States or the contracting officer thereunder.

(f) In every subcontract made in accordance with the provisions hereof require the subcontractor to agree to comply fully with all the undertakings and obligations of the contractor herein, excepting such as do not apply to such subcontractor's work.

(g) At all times keep at the site of the work a duly appointed representative, who shall receive and execute on the part of the contractor such notices, directions, and instructions as the contracting officer may desire to give.

(h) At all times use its best efforts in all its acts hereunder to protect and subserve the interest of the contracting officer and the United States.

ARTICLE VII.

Right to terminate contract: Should the contractor at any time refuse, neglect, or fail in any respect to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence or default in the performance of any of the agreements herein contained, the contracting officer may, at his option, after five days' written notice to the contractor, terminate this contract and may enter upon the premises and take possession, for the purpose of completing said work, of all materials, tools, equipment, and appliances, and all options, privileges, and rights, and may complete or employ any other person or persons to complete said work. In case of such termination of the contract, the contracting officer shall pay to the contractor such amounts of money on account of the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as will result in fully reimbursing the contractor for the cost of the work up to the time of such termination, plus a fee computed thereon at the rate or rates for monthly payments set forth in Article IV hereof; and the contracting officer shall also pay to the contractor compensation, either by purchase or rental, at the election of the contracting officer, for any equipment retained; such compensation, in the event of rental, to be in accordance with paragraph (c) of Article II, and in the event of purchase to be based upon the valuation determined by the contracting officer as of the time of his taking such possession. The contractor hereby agrees that such payments when made shall constitute full settlement of all claims of the contractor against the contracting officer and the United States, or either of them, for money claimed to be due to the contractor for any reason whatsoever. In case of such termination of the contract the contracting officer shall further assume and become liable for all such obligations, commitments, and unliquidated claims as the contractor may have theretofore in good faith undertaken or incurred in connection with said work, and the contractor shall, as a condition of receiving the payments mentioned in this article, execute and deliver all such papers and take all such steps as the contracting officer may require for the purpose of fully vesting in him the rights and benefits of the contractor under such obligations or commitments. When the contracting officer shall have performed the duties incumbent upon him under the provisions of this article, the contracting officer shall thereafter be entirely released and discharged of and from any and all demands, actions, or claims of any kind on the part of the contractor hereunder or on account hereof.

ARTICLE VIII.

Abandonment of work by contracting officer: If conditions should arise which in the opinion of the contracting officer make it advisable or necessary to cease work under this contract, the contracting officer may abandon the work and terminate this contract. In such case the contracting officer shall assume and become liable for all such obligations, commitments, and unliquidated claims as the contractor may have theretofore, in good faith, undertaken or incurred in connection with said work; and the contractor shall, as a condition of receiving the payments mentioned in this article, execute and deliver all such papers, and take all such steps as the contracting officer may require for the purpose of fully vesting in him the rights and benefits of the contractor under such obligations or commitments. The contracting officer shall pay to the contractor such an amount of money on account of the unpaid balance of the cost of the work and of the fee as will result in the contractor receiving full reimbursement for the cost of the work up to the time of such abandonment, plus a fee to be computed in the following manner: To the cost of the work up to the time of such abandonment shall be added the amount of the contractual obligations or commitments assumed by the contracting officer, and such total shall be treated as the cost of the work, upon which the fee shall be computed in accordance with the provisions of Article III hereof. When the contracting officer shall have performed the duties incumbent upon him under the provisions of this article, the contracting officer and the United States shall thereafter be entirely released and discharged of and from any and all demands, actions, or claims of any kind on the part of the contractor hereunder or on account hereof.

ARTICLE IX.

Bond: The contractor shall prior to commencing the said work furnish a bond, with sureties satisfactory to the contracting officer, in the sum of $250,000, conditioned upon its full and faithful performance of all the terms, conditions, and provisions of this contract and upon its prompt payment of all bills for labor, material, or other service furnished to the contractor.

ARTICLE X.

Convict labor: No person or persons shall be employed in the performance of this contract who are undergoing sentence of imprisonment at hard labor imposed by the courts of any of the several States, Territories, or municipalities having criminal jurisdiction.

ARTICLE XI.

Hours and conditions of labor: No laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by this contract, in the employ of the contractor, or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated, shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day upon such work, such prohibition being in accordance with the act approved June 19, 1912, limiting the hours of daily service of mechanics and laborers on work under contracts to which the United States is a party. For each violation of the requirements of this article a penalty of $5 shall be imposed upon the contractor for each laborer or mechanic for every calendar day in which said employee is required or permitted to labor more than eight hours upon said work, and all penalties thus imposed shall be withheld for the use and benefit of the United States: Provided, That this paragraph shall not be enforced nor shall any penalty be exacted in case such violation shall occur while there is in effect any valid Executive order suspending the provisions of said act approved June 19, 1912, or waiving the provisions and stipulations thereof with respect to either this contract or any class of contracts in which this contract shall be included, or when the violation shall be due to any extraordinary events or conditions of manufacture, or to any emergency caused by fire, famine, or flood, by danger to life or property, or by other extraordinary events or conditions on account of which, by subsequent Executive order, such past violation shall have been excused.

In the event of any dispute with reference to wages, hours, or other conditions appertaining to said work, between the contractor or any subcontractor and labor employed by him on said work, the contractor or subcontractor shall immediately notify the contracting officer of the existence of such dispute and the reasons therefor. The contracting officer may, at his option, instruct the contractor or subcontractor involved in such dispute as to the method or steps which the contractor or subcontractor should follow with reference thereto, and the contractor or subcontractor shall thereupon comply with such instructions.

ARTICLE XII.

Right to transfer or sublet: Neither this contract nor any interest therein shall be assigned or transferred. The contractor shall not enter into any subcontract for any part of the work herein specified without the consent and approval in writing of the contracting officer. In case of such assignment, transfer, or subletting without the consent and approval, in writing, of the contracting officer, the contracting officer may refuse to carry out this contract either with the transferor or transferee, but all rights of action for any breach of this contract by the contractor are reserved to the United States.

ARTICLE XIII.

No participation in profits by Government officials: No Member of or Delegate to Congress or Resident Commissioners nor any other person belonging to or employed in the military service of the United States is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this contract or to any benefit that may arise therefrom, but this article shall not apply to this contract so far as it may be within the operation or exception of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stats., 1109).

ARTICLE XIV.

Settlement of disputes: This contract shall be interpreted as a whole and the intent of the whole instrument, rather than the interpretation of any special clause, shall govern. If any doubts or disputes shall arise as to the meaning or interpretation of anything in this contract, or if the contractor shall consider himself prejudiced by any decision of the contracting officer made under the provisions of Article IV hereof, the matter shall be referred to the officer in charge of cantonment construction for determination. If, however, the contractor shall feel aggrieved by the decision of the officer in charge of cantonment construction he shall have the right to submit the same to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto.

ARTICLE XV.

This contract shall bind and inure to the contractor and its successors.

It is understood and agreed that wherever the words "contracting officer" are used herein the same shall be construed to include his successor in office, any other person to whom the duties of the contracting officer may be assigned by the Secretary of War, and any duly appointed representative of the contracting officer.

Witness the hands of the parties hereto the day and year first above written, all in triplicate.

Mr. STERLING. I think, Mr. President, I have no further comment to make upon this question of the cantonments now. The letter of the Secretary and the statements furnished may speak for themselves.

Just a word with reference to the conference report on the food-control bill.

There are some things in this conference report which I regret very much—not that I shall not vote for the report. I regret that the conferees saw fit to adopt and present to the Senate again the original House proposition in regard to licensing. It seemed to me that the Senate provision in regard to licensing the business of importing, manufacturing, or storing any of the necessaries described in this bill was a wholesome provision, and that to limit the licensing to the manufacturing, storing, or importing of necessaries entering into interstate commerce was as far as there was any necessity for the Government to go at this time. I thought of some of the consequences of the very sweeping provisions of the House bill and, as it stands now, the conference report.

Out in my part of the country—and I think it true of the State of Nebraska and other States—there may be found in every small town of, say, 250 or 300 inhabitants the feed mill where the farmers take their oats, their corn, and their barley or their rye to be ground for feed. Under the provisions of this bill the man who runs such a mill is a manufacturer of feed, or the farmer who keeps a mill on his own premises for the purpose of grinding feed for his own use is a manufacturer of one of the articles called necessaries in this bill. Under the power given by the bill a license can be required of the farmer or of the man in town who, for the benefit of the farmers, runs the little mill for the purpose of grinding feed for farm stock. Of course inspection would follow the licensing of such a business.

I wish heartily that some provision could have been incorporated in the bill so limiting it that it would not be made to apply to this particular business or industry. In saying that I shall support the bill and the conference report, Mr. President, it is with the hope, so ably expressed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] on yesterday, that it will be wisely and justly administered; that it will not be extended to activities or businesses to which there is no need to extend it; and that the power conferred will be used with some discretion and sense of "the fitness of things." It is with that hope, indeed, that I shall support the bill so far as the licensing feature of it is concerned.

One other proposition, Mr. President, is that in regard to the board which the Senate provided for the administration of the food-control bill—a board of three instead of one man. Now, nothing ever seemed to me to be more reasonable than the Senate provision, under all the conditions. Why, boards, commissions, and committees are the ordinary means by which government is carried on. It is one of the means by which we transact business here in the Senate, and the great means in the House, of course, is committee work.

We could make no headway without using the instrumentality of committees, and it is so through all the activities of Government. We have the many and various bureaus and commissions that administer different affairs of Government. Why should there not be a commission of a reasonable number to administer the provisions of this great bill, especially when we consider the diversity and variety of interests involved, and the tremendous powers conferred?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes that the mill of the miller about whom he just spoke could be taken by the Government without just compensation, under present and existing circumstances?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. I ask him as a lawyer if it has not been repeatedly held that depriving the owner of the use of his property is a taking of the property?

Mr. STERLING. I think it has been so held, as a proposition of law.

Mr. REED. If we, by this bill, say to the proprietor of a piece of property, "You shall not use it unless you take out a license, and when you take out the license you shall agree to limit the uses to which you will put that property," have we not taken property without due process of law, and can we do it without compensation?

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Missouri presents what seems to me a close question. But I think with reference to the manufacture, the importation, and the disposition of those things in this bill called "necessaries," as a matter of law a license system can be provided for, and under that license there may be a regulation of the business. It is to meet the emergency of war, and I put it on that ground now, if none other.

Mr. REED. If we can not take the property outright under present conditions, then we can not take it in part, and we can not take it through the pretext of a license. Now, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this bill applies to the small miller doing a local business just as he says, doing a legitimate business just as he says, doing a business that never has been held to be classed with the liquor business or similar semioutlawed occupations, but I call his attention to the fact that the Federal Government possesses no police powers except such police powers as are attached to the powers expressly granted to them.

Mr. STERLING. I would say to the Senator from Missouri that ordinarily to take property without compensation is, of course, to take it without due process of law. To deprive a man of the use of his property wholly or partially is, in principle, the same as taking it without due process of law, and the only thing that justifies that regulation which does or may deprive him of any use of it, or partly deprive him of the use of it, is the existing emergency of war; and still regulation does not necessarily imply a deprivation of the use.

Mr. President, one thought further relative to the food-administration board. I think I know, and I think other Senators know, how we first became imbued with the idea that Mr. Hoover was the man of all others to be food administrator in the United States during the war. I do not question his ability or his patriotism for a moment, and if a food-administration board were provided for I would think it eminently fitting that Mr. Hoover should be at the head of that board; but, Mr. President, Mr. Hoover's vast experience has been in feeding or helping to feed some millions of starving people in Belgium. It will be a different problem, and altogether a more complex problem, to be food administrator of the United States under this bill than as head of the Belgian Relief Commission to solicit and expend funds and provide food to meet the wants of the Belgian people. Powers are conferred under the terms of this bill unlike any he ever exercised in his capacity as the head of the Belgian Commission, and it would seem to me quite reasonable if Mr. Hoover, instead of desiring full control, should welcome the appointment of two additional men here, such as the President may, in his discretion and his wisdom, think fit and competent to assist him and to share with him in an advisory capacity, at least, the very great responsibility of administering the food-control bill. I think nothing would be lost in the way of efficiency, and, as stated yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I think the additional members of this board would serve to create confidence throughout the United States in the administration of the law that we are now about to enact.

The same proposition is involved, Mr. President, in the provision for the joint committee of the two Houses—two Republicans and three Democrats from each—for the purpose of supervising the expenditures of the war, which provision has been eliminated by the conferees. As it stood when it left the Senate, it was not to supervise generally the conduct of the war, but it was to supervise the expenditures made under contract for the purpose of carrying on the war. It seemed reasonable to suppose that the President would welcome the appointment of such a joint committee, composed of members of both parties and from the two Houses of Congress; for they would, I think, without embarrassment to him, have borne some of the responsibility of seeing that these vast expenditures made in carrying on the war were wisely and properly made. The desire for such a joint committee is no reflection on the President. The same argument will apply here that applies to the food-control board—it is the great argument, after all—the people will have greater confidence and will more readily lend their support to the administration in the conduct of the war, if they feel that here is an able, patriotic joint committee of the two Houses, made up from the two parties, whose business it will be to superintend and examine the expenditures that are made of the vast appropriations we have made and are yet to make for the purpose of carrying on the war.

As I stated, Mr. President, I shall support this conference report, but, on account of the elimination of that part of the bill as passed by the Senate providing for the joint committee, on account of the elimination of the food administration board, and on account of the sweeping licensing system now provided for, I shall vote for it with some misgiving. I shall hope, however, that the powers conferred will be exercised with wisdom and good judgment, and that no evil results will flow therefrom.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, while this bill was under discussion in the Senate I at length gave my views on what I considered was its proper purpose—the encouragement of production. I thought that under the operation of an unchangeable law, the law of supply and demand, whenever there was present an abundance, an over-production of any given article, regardless of what it was, it would be cheap, easily available to all those who desired it, and the scarcity of an article produced its high price. Therefore I thought that if Congress wanted to provide itself against the danger of lack of foodstuffs the only way, humanly speaking, that they might encourage extraordinary production of any article or articles was to remove as far as might be the danger of disastrous and impoverishing low prices incident to overproduction, especially where that overproduction was made by those who were financially unable to hold the commodity and to carry it over the period of overproduction and to guarantee to themselves by an equitable distribution of it a price that would render them a profit.

The producers of this country are perhaps as a class, more than any other class, without resources, without financial ability, but upon that class financially devolves the stupendous task of feeding millions of Americans and at this juncture the millions of our allies. You ask them to produce a surplus in the light of the disastrous experience they have had in the past when overproduction meant poverty. These crops are not crops for their consumption, but it represents to them their cash, their money. When they produce a surplus, the surplus rules the sale of it all and they would be impoverished. It is a curious anomaly, but it is true, that when the farmers of America produce a surplus they suffer. When they produce a less amount, they are most prosperous. It is the law of increasing and diminishing returns, which is exemplified powerfully in their case.

Therefore I believe that if we want to invite them to supply this Nation and our allies with an abundance of food we must, as far as human legislation can do it, provide against their suffering the disasters that will come by overproduction. Hence I say I was in favor of a minimum price, a minimum price fixed at a line that would mark a profit generally.

Criticism has been made here that no man could fix a fair and just price to meet all the different conditions under which a given crop such as wheat might be raised.

None of the members of the conference committee even took that into contemplation. The best we can do is the best that any legislation on any subject can do, and that is meet the general rule and not the exception. Hence we attempted to fix the minimum price. That, in the judgment of the conferees, would encourage the production of wheat, the great universal source of bread. I believe that that was the correct principle.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. REED. As the bill left the Senate, the minimum price of $2 for wheat was guaranteed for this year's crop. The argument that was adduced in favor of a guaranty for this year's crop was that the farmer's export market had been taken away and that it was proposed to vest an authority in the food-control board or individual which would control the domestic market. Now, the conferees changed that provision which guaranteed the price for this year to a guaranty for next year. Why was that done?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think I am violating no rule of propriety when I say that that question was discussed at some length, and an appeal was made to those who represent wheat-growing States, and they rather insisted that in view of the scarcity of wheat now and its present high prices, in the face of any artificial restriction that might be thrown around it, they would prefer, if anything, to leave it at this time to such exigencies as might arise. They were of opinion that there could not be any pressure brought that could possibly disastrously affect the price now, because, in their opinion, there was not more than enough scantily to provide for America and the allies, and as they wanted to seek to encourage an abundance for the 1917–18 crop, which would run into 1919 in sale, it would be effective to put a $2 minimum for 1918–19.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that the men from the wheat States urged these arguments. I suppose he means the men from wheat States who were on the conference committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is what I meant.

Mr. REED. Those men were men who never even thought of a guaranty for wheat, who allowed the bill to pass in the House of Representatives without any kind of a guaranteed limit. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think the judgment of the men who made this fight in the Senate for the wheat was quite perhaps as good, and their desire to serve the farmer quite as reliable, as the judgment of men who had never even dreamed of that sort of a guaranty?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, Mr. President, that is neither here nor there because a majority of the conference committee took the position that in view of the scanty store now in sight there possibly could not be any material effect upon the present crop. As far as I am individually concerned, and I am speaking for myself, it was a matter it seemed to me that was not worth the time it would take to reach an agreement as to whether it would affect the little residium of the present crop in its sale, because it is known that the present crop is so very small that the possibilities are that wheat is going to be much higher priced than it is now. For that reason it seemed to me——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Just as soon as I finish the sentence.

For that reason my only object was to encourage an abundant production by putting a base line which would represent a profit to crops to be made. We discussed the probable effect of an embargo. I listened to the discussion of the Senator who is now interrogating me in reference to shutting out the world's market to the farmer by an embargo. It was an argument that was proper, but the committee felt that as this crop was now being stored and as the crop was so notoriously small there would be guaranteed to the farmer a price perhaps in excess of what he is now getting, but the thing for us to address ourselves to was, as far as we could by legislation, to encourage a superabundance in the crop year now pending.

I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I am sorry that the Senator who so generously yields to me is not as well posted on wheat as he is on cotton, because he is one of the great cotton experts, I think, in the country. He speaks of the remaining small part of this year's crop. This year's crop is not yet one-third thrashed, probably not 20 per cent of it thrashed. The vast amount of it stands in the shock in the fields. They have hardly quit cutting this year's crop in the northern part of the United States. It is all in hands of the farmers yet, substantially.

The second observation I wish to make by way of correction is that the statement that this is an insignificant crop is a mistake. This year's wheat crop is substantially the average crop of the United States. It is admitted that there will be practically 300,000,000 bushels of wheat to send abroad. That 300,000,000 bushels of wheat to send abroad under normal conditions would, of course, fix the price that it is sold for home consumption. There is at the present time a very high price for wheat.

It exists, I think, because of two factors: First, the ordinary methods of selling wheat have been almost entirely broken up; second, they have dinned it into the ears of the farmer that the world is going to starve to death so successfully that the farmer is hanging on to his wheat; but, of course, the time will soon come when he will have to let go of it. Now, when he does let go of it his surplus that goes abroad will have to be marketed through one concern that holds the monopoly of the foreign market, and that is this English company, the wheat export company. It is, therefore, very likely that that wheat export company will put a price far below $2 for this year's crop; and if they do, it will do more to discourage the farmer from planting next year's crop than anything Federal Government guaranty can do toward encouraging him.

So I want to say to the Senator now, who has in all matters with respect to this bill, I think, been very earnest and very sincere, who, I think, wanted to do something for the wheat farmer, if he had come to some of us who live in wheat States and who were responsible for this $2 guaranty, we could have given him some light which would have saved the farmers on this year's crop, and next year's crop would have been taken care of by legislation to be hereafter enacted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I do not care to consume too much time; but, in answer to that, I want to say I can not conceive of any intelligent body of men, with a guaranty of $2 fixed in the bill for next year's seeding and harvest, being foolish enough, before that crop is planted, to deliberately break the price of the present small crop below $2. That would simply mean that they would serve notice on the farmer that they were determined to break the market below a reasonable profit, and would have the identical effect the Senator from Missouri indicates would occur in case they did break it below that point. That remains to be seen; it is up to the administration, and that leads me to say——

Mr. REED. No; that, unfortunately, is not "up to the administration"; it is up to an English company.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is up to those charged with the administration.

Mr. REED. That is connected with high Englishmen, great Englishmen, who are here and who are contending now, first, that the allied Governments ought to be furnished every war supply at the price at which our Government obtains it from our own people; second, that their people should be furnished all kinds of American products at the same price our people get, and who insist that the American market should be made to serve the British and French people. I do not complain bitterly of these men; I do not criticize these men for coming; but I do say that we have put the American farm prices in the hands of a British company, and I do unhesitatingly say that you will hear from the American farmer on that, and I think you heard from him in Virginia yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, be that as it may, I do not know anything about whether or not this is to be entirely turned over into the hands of the Englishmen. We were trying to pass a bill that within our judgment would as nearly as possible meet the situation, and if those who have the bill in charge saw fit to turn it over to those who have no sympathy with America or with the American farmer we will find that out in plenty of time to correct it. Now, what I do say——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator just let me make this observation? He says we will find it out in plenty of time to protect the farmer. How will you protect the farmer who has 500 bushels of wheat or 100 bushels of wheat to sell and has to have the money, and who therefore sells it upon this controlled market? How will you protect him hereafter by legislation coming in the future? If the Senator will pardon me, it is like your little cotton raiser I have heard him speak of and so eloquently defend. When the time comes for market, for the most part, he has to bring his crop down and has to take the price. There is no protection for that man except the price that he gets in the market. If you have taken his market away from him, as you feared it was taken away from him when we put cotton in this bill, you will have done him a great wrong; and just as you thought to keep cotton out of the bill I tried to protect the wheat farmer. You have taken out the guaranty that was to come to him this year. You have left him at the mercy of an English export company now, and you say to him, "We will take care of you in the future." I am talking about taking care of him now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, as far as that is concerned, I have given to the Senate the reasons upon which we reached the conclusion as to that. There were some other features of the bill which some of us stood out for, but, as the conference report indicates, it was of no avail.

Now, touching the two amendments placed in the bill by the Senate, about which this battle has raged, I wish to say here frankly that, so far as the commission to administer the bill is concerned, I was in favor of that. I was strongly in favor of it. I stated my reasons when the bill was under discussion, and will not repeat them now. I did not think that the auditing committee was a proper one for a place in this bill or that we should put an auditing committee provision on the bill. But the Senate sought to put it on. As a conferee it was my duty to use all the power that I had, short of defeating the bill, to keep those two provisions in the bill. Every member of the conference committee on the part of the Senate for nearly a week stood firm on those two propositions until the President of the United States, upon whom rests the responsibility of administering this law, stated to the committee by proxy that they would embarrass him in the administration of this legislation.

We in the Senate were passing a bill to be administered by him, and the two committees or boards were mere suggestions or expressions of opinion on the part of the Senate how it should be administered. It did not affect the purpose and principle of the bill. He said that these two committees or boards would embarrass him in the multitude of responsibilities that were resting upon him. I was of opinion that the commission would aid him. Upon him all this stupendous legislation converges; when we have gone to our homes there will rest upon him the crushing weight of responsibility for the conduct of this war. When he asked me as a legislator not to forego a principle in the bill, but simply a policy of administration, and allow him a freer hand in administering the law, I voted to recede, because he asked for the responsibility and took it from me and placed it on himself. The ultimate responsibility rests upon him, and God knows that I would not add one jot or tittle to the almost inconceivable burden that rests upon him as the head of the American Government, and around whom revolves the destiny of the world. Upon the patriotism, upon the loyalty to the principles of our Government and their faithful execution depend the destiny of civilization. Woodrow Wilson is to-day the man whom the fortunes of chance or of politics has made the keystone to the arch of the world's hope. To America all the lines of the past have converged, and into the President's hands are placed the forces that are to mold the future. I know that he has an appreciation of the stupendous responsibilities that rest upon him. He can not avoid them if he would, and I hope he would not avoid them if he could in this emergency. I voted to relieve him of what he in a plea to the conference committee, a personal plea, asked might not be placed in the bill as an expression of the manner in which we thought it ought to be administered.

I am speaking for myself. The conferees yielded, and I believe the Senate is going to yield on those two points, not that Woodrow Wilson has asked it, but because the President of the United States in the time of national travail asks it. I voted to recede because I thought on the question of policy when he asked it perhaps it was my duty to recede. It did not involve a principle; it involved a policy of administration; and he said the policy would embarrass him. He preferred his own policy. Therefore I voted to recede.

Mr. President, I have said thus much in order that certain reflections which have been thrown from time to time on the conferees should be explained as far as I am concerned. I want my colleagues in the Senate to understand that I am explaining, not apologizing. I am giving you an American citizen's reasons why he did a thing when charged with the responsibility by you, and why he met that responsibility in the manner that he did meet it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to close the argument on the report—in favor of its adoption. At an earlier stage of this debate I freely presented my views upon this bill—upon its merits and its constitutionality.

Very eminent legal minds, such as the Senator from Utah now presiding [Mr. KING in the chair]; the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]; the very learned and industrious Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; Senator BORAH, of Idaho; Senator SHIELDS, of Tennessee; and others voiced opposition to my views, both as to the constitutionality of the measure and its legal phases. Some of the Senators differed from my viewpoint as to the expediency and the advantage of the bill. As to that, of course, there will remain differences.

Senators have said that when this bill has been passed and gone into effect there will be disappointment disclosed to those who had hoped benefits to flow from it. Sir, one thing we can console ourselves with, even if this doleful prophecy shall be realized. There never has been a serious measure so thoroughly considered to which the best minds of the Senate have given attention and diligence more than this one. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], long an able representative of his State in this body, then the Attorney General of the United States, the head law officer of this country; then the Secretary of State, the head diplomatic officer of this Nation; now returned to the Senate with that fullness of experience—addressed himself to the constitutional features of this bill and found it agreeable to sustain it in its general provisions, both as to constitutionality and expediency. I mention the Senator from Pennsylvania merely that it may be understood by the country how thoroughly nonpartisan this discussion is. The same may be said of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who fortified the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who also had experience as an officer in the execution of the trust laws of this country. He gave his views as a lawyer long sustained by many experiences.

On this side of the Chamber the best of counsel prevailed; the best judgment was tendered. As a result the American people can have the assurance that, whatever shall be the final result of this bill, no interest of America, whether in behalf of the Constitution, so eminently led by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on this side of the Chamber, on the contention of unconstitutionality or the question of the propriety of the bill, its practicality, its workable future, its application—all, all received the most serious consideration, the most careful investigation. This measure will go before the American people the most completely analyzed and considered measure of its importance that possibly has gone from this body.

Mr. President, there must always be differences between independent minds upon a measure so novel as this—one which is an innovation on our system of government. These differences of judgment are born of two conditions: One, the geography which a man represents; the other his independent intellect, deducing, as he does, from his learning and his investigation, his own convictions. There is no better sign nor healthier one than that these divergent views shall always be expressed and shall be spoken with freedom. When they have been so expressed, we then know at the conclusion that no one's voice has been suppressed, nor can there come truthfully from any quarter of the country the cry that any protest has not received audience.

Mr. President, from this reflection may I be so bold as to hope that never again will a Senator on this floor rise and impeach the integrity—I mean the mental integrity—of a Senator merely because of these differences by alluding to him as "traitor" or employing the term "un-American," so pregnant of accusation, yet so apparently to be justified as innocent of criminal accusation? To the minds of many its definition means disloyalty. Why should a Senator on this floor, because he is firmly wedded to this measure or because of his devotion to the cause of the President, as I am, or his attachment to that which he may call his party duty, find it agreeable to indulge in expressions of that kind without reflecting on the danger he does the very cause he advocates? If that sort of thing shall be multiplied in expression in this body, I warn my esteemed friend from Mississippi, the senior Senator [Mr. WILLIAMS], to whom I now particularly allude, and such others as choose to follow in the lead of these expressions, that the effect will be to drive from the support of the President and the administration every Senator who has been so characterized.

For myself, I would have a contempt for that man who had risen to the dignity of filling a seat in this place if his nature were not such as not to prefer to give his seat up in defeat than to have it held out that he had surrendered his convictions under the cry that he was a traitor and under the fear of the effect of these accusations. The result will be that a man having an honest difference with the administration—a real mental distinction—upon measures, an honest opposition as to the method in which they will operate, will continue his opposition in order that he might not give evidence that he has surrendered because of the fear that he had been detected in disloyalty. More than that, if he is an honest man—and no other man is in this Chamber, nor can get here—his people, who have known him for years and years before they honored him with his place, will regard those accusations as an aspersion upon themselves. They will feel that they have been charged with having chosen a disloyal man to represent them, and that they are being thus voiced by treason; and, knowing their representative to be neither, they will rally around him that they may protect the honor of their State against the accusation, and will uphold him in his opposition to the measure or to the President rather than to have it overruled by an adverse decision, lest from the adverse decision there may come the conclusion from the public that this particular constituency have been represented by a dishonest and disloyal man.

Let us have common judgment; let us not repeat this sort of thing. If there be not the sense of amenities to persuade us against this indulgence, let there be reflection that by such we do injury to the cause we advocate; that by entering upon such methods we defeat the result which we would achieve. This we do by arraying forces against us which we think we are inviting for us through that form of malediction.

I am called upon to refer to this because it seems to have grown so general. There now seems to be no longer timidity to enter upon that form of accusation. Certain Senators seem to feel free to indulge it and to repeat it as though it were an ordinary speech from the mouth of a man merely voicing opposition to ideas.

Mr. President, the American public regard this great body in two ways—either as a body of great thought and great responsibility or one of no thought and no respectability. If the latter estimate shall increase, it will be due to the estimate that certain Senators set upon this body by their thoughtless characterization, by their unmeant accusations, but which in the zeal of utterance they find themselves indulging in as a habit to the injury of this body, to the clouding of the honor of the country, and to the defeat of the measures involved. May I be so bold as to hope that we shall not have repetition of this?

Mr. President, there is no un-American man in this body. There is no traitor on this floor. If ever the aspect of a traitor were raised in this body he would be driven from the floor at once, without clergy or mercy. If ever the attitude of disloyalty were disclosed in speech or action on the part of any Senator, so reprehensible would he be in the minds and appreciation of all his fellows that he could not lift his head to recognition. So let us not put that stigma upon honest men merely because it comes easily to the expression of the mouths of those who are themselves able and loyal Senators but sometimes hasty and careless orators.

Mr. President, I want this measure to pass. All of the provisions of this bill can not meet my whole approval. The Senator from Missouri, without being conscious of the fact, voiced my peculiar predicament. I represent a grain State. I represent two states of political situation; one, the state of Chicago, with its great crowded population of poor, miserable, and humble, in certain quarters; its large business, its great commerce, in others—all anxious that certain provisions of this bill shall go hastily into effect because of the promise of relief which has been assured them to be the result of the measure. Then, sir, I represent, with my eminent colleague, the State of Illinois outside of Chicago, where are the wheat and corn growing classes, the farmers. Many of those, I must say, sir, are in protest against what they feel will be the consequence upon them of this measure. I differ from any colleague, Senator SHERMAN. I regard him radically wrong upon many of the fundamentals of Government; but I should be unjust to truth if I did not admit that he represents a part of the State that is in revolt against certain provisions of this measure as they are taught to regard it, and that in many of his voicings here he but echoes those sentiments. But, sir, I am compelled for myself to recognize that there is no measure with every feature of which every man can agree, and that no feature of every bill applies uniformly to every part of our country. I am compelled to choose a measure according to what I think will be in its general result its general effect. I am willing to adopt the philosophy of Portia, that "I would rather do a little wrong that I might do a great good."

Mr. President, then what is the measure as to which the conferees of the Senate and the conferees of the House met together with divergent views? Like a jury in a damage suit, like a board of arbitration in a contest, they finally came to a conclusion upon all opposing contentions. The verdict had to surrender one contention or the other. If not, they would have been in session to-day, and they would have continued day unto day and year unto year. Some yielding had to be. When we in the Senate added to the bill provisions that were not in the House bill, either they had to be yielded to, sir, by the House or retreated from by the Senate. Consequently we are confronted with the ordinary course of legislation—the mere compromises and concessions to bring it about.

Therefore this is a food bill, so designated, for the purpose of regulating food. Its object is to provide food for the soldiers who are on their way to battle for our Nation; to provide food for the citizens who shall remain here to survive and to be sustained; to provide against exactions and injustice produced by the fuel barons of the country; and to lay the foundation, so far as it can be laid, for Government supervision and control of those commodities essential to the welfare of the individual.

Senators, we are inclined to feel that all we see in this project would be new to government. The bill is an innovation in our country, but may I interest you in the thought that the historical literature of farm management is voluminous? It includes ancient literature, covering the control of grain, the control of its price, the control of its output quantity, and the control of its distribution. Varro cites 50 Greek authors whose works on the subject he knew, beginning with Hesiod and Xenophon. Indeed, Margo of Carthage wrote a treatise as to the control of prices and the distribution of food, writing it in the Punic tongue, which was regarded of such value that the Romans had it translated into Latin. It became a textbook for the guidance of control in unusual events of the grain crops when the armies of Rome were out in the fields of conquest. And it is familiar to the scholars about me that Cato the Senior availed himself of these treatises as a foundation for the decrees which went out of Rome governing the amount of the crops to be distributed to the people, the methods by which they should be distributed to the soldiers, and their price. Subsequently, I regret to say, they went too far, and under a paternalistic form of government sought to give a quantity of land to certain citizenry and a certain quantity of grain, which soon led, of course, to the disadvantage of the citizen, for he ceased any industry on his own part and became a charge on his country. I merely mention that to the Senate to show that what we do now, while apparently an innovation under our form of government, seems after all but an emulation of that which was done by the ancients since history gives us any record.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I presume the Senator, by contemporaneous authorities with those which he has just quoted, could easily demonstrate that slavery is quite justifiable?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the authorities to which I refer—and a Senator near me asks if they are from the books of JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS on the Two Republics, Rome and the United States——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, filtering down through that particular channel, I understand that they would, of course, come to us with a sort of sanctity that would put them above reproach or criticism. So I withdraw my question.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say, Mr. President, it is true that a work written by this JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, or one of its volumes, dwelling upon the comparison of the two Republics, makes adversion to these facts and does also have observations as to the slavery prevailing in those lands. I will say to the Senator that there were precedents in the older days for slavery, and that there were those in the old South who contended that slavery was justifiable in our own land because of those precedents. They quoted Scripture also as precedent. But, Mr. President, the Senator must distinguish between precedents which were practical and moral, which could be emulated to the advantage of free government, and those which were immoral and un-Christian and could only be adopted to the destruction of free government. There is the distinction between the precedents as to agriculture on the one hand and slavery on the other.

Now, Mr. President, I merely call attention to the fact that this conference report, which is being so ably sustained by the industrious efforts of the eminent Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], acting as chairman, can be found to be a duplicate of many concessions of similar character in all forms of agricolan history.

Mr. President, there are reasons justifying our action in sustaining this result, however, that have not been dwelt upon. Not only is it necessary to control food that we may guide it to proper destination, to proper distribution, but there will come a time when we have got to consider the expenditures that we are undertaking.

The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in a very thorough discussion, well worthy of the reflection of any Senator, on yesterday called attention to the amount of the expenditures being made and invited the serious consideration of the Senate as to whether these expenditures should not be so supervised that the public should constantly know in what manner their money went forth. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a short while ago presented figures which, according to his judgment—and however much I differ from him in the doctrines of politics, as a mystical, magical metaphysician of statistics no one can dispute him [laughter]—the Senator produced what appeared to be reputable figures to demonstrate the vast sums of money which we would have to expend according to already presented estimates. Mr. President, in providing money for surplus food or to pay excessive prices for necessary food would be an unnecessary expenditure, and that should be guarded and watched. This war will be very expensive. That it may run from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 a day, if future contemplation shall be realized, few of us can now dispute. The Senator from Utah intimates that possibly it may be more than that, and I take it that my brother Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who has suggested something to me, probably indulges in that fear also.

Mr. President, it is interesting to contemplate war expenditures. The Napoleonic wars, which lasted from 1793 to 1815, cost approximately $7,000,000,000, while we have voted $7,000,000,000 in a single fund, which will only go to the preliminaries of this conflict. The Mexican War cost us about $100,000,000. The Civil War resulted in the aggregate expenditure of about $8,000,000,000, running from 1861 to 1865, before all things were ended. The Franco-Prussian War consumed about $3,500,000,000. The second South African War, from 1900 to 1902, cost in round figures $1,500,000,000. The Russo-Japanese engagement consumed not less, Mr. President, than $3,500,000,000; and in our hostilities with Spain in 1898 we expended $175,000,000. Surely, sir, from these figures you will gather what will be the stupendous sum we will be compelled to expend if this enterprise proceeds upon the magnitude of men and lands it is now projected. Then, sir, for that reason it is prudent that any step that can be taken here that would limit expenditures, while yet doing justice to the producer, shall be adopted by us.

Mr. President, with the object of the bill therefore so meritorious, is there a man here who would object to the measure? None. Is there a Senator who, because of some technical objection to the conference report, would defeat the object of this legislation? None. Is there a Senator here, however tenacious of his constitutional views or other attitudes of mind, who would deny the public the main benefits of the measure because of these incidental objections? None. Then, Senators, might I be so bold as to ask, if you succeeded in sustaining the particular individual objections you have, and yet the result that flowed from your action were to deny to the American public the general benefits which I apprehend is in the spirit of the bill, would not every one of us regret it? Would not the Senator who had prevailed regret it? I know he would, for I know the patriotism of every man who serves in this body.

Then, sir, I make free to ask Senators if they can not waive mere objections to matters which apply purely locally in their influences that we may have a union of support upon this measure? And can not they justify the waiving of those objections upon these grounds: That all over the world there has gone forth the printed charge that this bill is the test of such strength as the President of the United States will have in the support of his war measures. Mr. President, there will be focused millions of eyes upon this test in view of the controversy which has raged around it. Senators who will be seen opposing this report will be misconstrued, and I know misjudged. That may not concern certain brave characters, but it would concern them if they thought that that misjudging of them likewise would be a misjudging of their country. That the wrong condemnation of them would wrongly condemn their Commander in Chief and wrongly condemn this body which these Senators represent.

Mr. President, it has gone forth that in this measure the President, as the Commander in Chief, is being so opposed by distracted elements and discordant sources that there will be the evidence that he has not the body behind him. That he has not the Senate in support of him.

Mr. President, because I know that every Senator here wishes to refute that calumny and deny that slander, I would that each Senator could find it agreeable to abandon his specific objections frankly and freely before his countrymen, on something after the order of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], still adhering, if he please, to his conviction in conscience, but freely admitting that he prefers to yield it, lest from the contrary there should arise an impression against his country and the Senate that would wrong both.

Mr. President, I have other reasons which I beg to submit to the Senate. If we do not present unity at this time, we will convince those who are associated with us in foreign lands in our enterprise that we have not the spirit that would yield mere pride of objections in order to accomplish the great end which we have undertaken. We will dishearten many; while, on the other hand, if we will show that union of purpose we will nerve the men who are about to move to the front and give new heart to those who are about to make sacrifice for their Nation. More than that, sir, we will slay that incipient rebellion which we have seen to lift its head throughout parts of this country against the enlistment of soldiers, against obedience to the draft law and the authority of the country. When, sir, they shall receive the blow which they should receive from the voice and action of their representatives, they will quail before it and surrender, for they will have presented themselves before the world without support, and, while we will not with voice have referred to them in specific condemnation, our action will be an announcement to them of how unwelcome their conduct is before the American Nation and how contemptible in the shadow of the American flag. For that reason also I beseech my brother Senators to contemplate the effect of waiving their objections upon ordinary matters that they may give unanimous support to this measure.

Mr. President, there is a last consideration to which I beg the indulgence of the Senate to advert. Senators on this floor have from time to time referred to our soldiers moving to France. The public press have referred to our men moving to France. The eminent senior Senator from New York paid a splendid tribute to France and her achievements with respect to the management of this conflict. Mr. President, the word "France," beautiful as it is pronounced, in view of the sacrifice of that country for the great cause of liberty and justice, will not be so frequently mentioned alone hereafter as before. The reason will be that there will be other countries to take our consideration in common with marvelous France.

Mr. President, we must not quail before the spectacle of fact. We must be courageous and view things just as they are. There is Russia; there is the practical fact of her situation. We can not hide our eyes, if we want to, to what all of that means. There is Italy, surrounded with the hordes of Austria, and the dangerous position she occupies in this conflict, sir. If the future is to be what the news of the times threaten, the next move of the American soldier will be toward Russia, then toward Italy. Behind these soldiers, wherever they go, must go food and supplies. For, sir, if we ask Russia to emulate our example of government and take from us the principles which we have endeavored to implant in civilization and ask her newborn country to fight for them, we must likewise put behind her such assistance as would be loyal and just. It is not sufficient that at a distance we merely commend her, praise her, or encourage her. We will be compelled, sir, to go further. Our soldiers must take the course, under the wise management of those who lead our armies, and find their way, through the shift of armies to posts of necessity. This will be where they will supplement and sustain and reenforce and strengthen those of Russia fighting in the cause which we say is necessary to the freedom of the world and the democracy of civilization. The same course, sir, must be followed as to Italy, if Italy is not to be the victim of Prussia. Our men must likewise join there in the conflict along the Trentino and along the border where Italy and Austria wage their warfare in order to preserve France from the Austrians' victorious return march. As well, sir, in the crescent of the Bosphorus—in the dark shadows of guilty Turkey—assistance will yet have to be provided.

So, sir, it must be plain to you that if we are to move on further than now charted for us, we move on very much further. And behind these men wherever they go must be the food of this Nation. The other nations, our friends in the cause, are not so situated that they can put their agriculture behind our men, for they have very few men who can serve them as farmers. The result must clearly be that from us almost alone must come the source and supply to our armies and those of our copartners, who are often spoken of as "allies." Then, confronting this situation courageously and admitting it freely, let us ask, Do we not owe it to ourselves, sir, that we should move on now, abandon every small objection, yield every delicate refinement, surrender mere pride of opinion for the object of the measure, for the aspect we can give the country and the example we can present to the world, sir, for the effect it may produce upon the men whom we have summoned to die for us if need be? May I not beseech my brother Senators for as near a united vote for this report as their sense of conscience and patriotism can possibly allow? And this, sir, to the end that we can say to the allies that to them we bring justice and freedom to the full extent of our ability, and to our own country we send every support that our arms, our voice, and our treasure can give to insure unconquerable America the victory that is destined to be hers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise for two purposes, the first of which I do as an act of justice to a gentleman whom I may have inadvertently wronged.

In the course of extemporaneous remarks the other day, I stated of Mr. John Beaver White:

> I do not know what his business operations were in England, but my information is he was there long enough to go through the bankruptcy court.

I did have such information, and I had it from a source which I regarded as absolutely reliable. I will say in passing, however, that I did not intend to make the remark; it was one of those things that came out of my lips when I was speaking in the hurry and haste of extemporaneous debate. But the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has called my attention to a letter he received from Mr. White, which I desire now to read to the Senate. The letter has been handed to me through the courtesy of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 7, 1917.

Hon. P. C. KNOX,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: May I ask your valued service in denying the statement made on the floor of the Senate yesterday by Senator REED, referring to me by name, as follows:

"I do not know what his business operations were in England, but my information is he was there long enough to go through the bankruptcy court."

This statement is absolutely without foundation in fact and contains not an atom of truth. Not only is the statement untrue, but I have never been even remotely connected with any financial failure of any kind or character.

Yours, faithfully, JOHN BEAVER WHITE.

Mr. President, as I made my statement openly and on the floor of the Senate, and in that way to the country, Mr. White is entitled to have his denial made in the same way, and I have therefore presented his letter. And I go further than that; I apologize to Mr. White in this public way for having made a statement about him upon information which he declares is incorrect, and which for the present I shall assume is incorrect. If I find in the future that there has been a mistake made in this apology, I shall retract the apology; but at the present time I want it to go as full and unequivocal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that I have discussed this bill to the weariness of the Senate I am aware. A further imposition upon your patience is excusable only because arguments and charges have been advanced which imperatively demand reply.

As I proceed, I shall endeavor to show—

First: THE INJUSTICE OF ATTACKS UPON MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, BECAUSE IN THE PERFORMANCE OF THEIR CONSTITUTIONAL DUTIES THEY HAVE EXERCISED THEIR INDEPENDENT JUDGMENTS.

Second: THAT THE BILL IS GROSSLY UNJUST TO THE FARMER, BECAUSE IT TAKES AWAY HIS MARKET AND COMPELS HIM TO SELL FOR PRICES ARBITRARILY FIXED BY ONE MAN.

Third: THAT THE BILL WEAKENS THE COUNTRY BY DISCOURAGING AGRICULTURE AND MENACING BUSINESS.

Fourth: THAT THE BILL IS IN MANY RESPECTS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Fifth: THAT CONGRESS HAS GIVEN TO THE PRESIDENT UPON ALL GREAT WAR MEASURES AN ENTHUSIASTIC AND PATRIOTIC SUPPORT.

Throughout the debate it has been covertly insinuated, if not openly asserted, that all who seek to alter or oppose a single provision of this bill are therefore bad citizens, enemies of the Republic, friends of Germany, and altogether traitorous scoundrels.

The policy of coercion and abuse has been extended to all measures branded "Administration." The purpose is to create an atmosphere of prejudice against Members of Congress who venture even occasionally to exercise an independent judgment.

I beg you to consider this strange new doctrine, which, if it be not arrested, may destroy the independence of the people, because it denies to their representatives freedom of action.

It is urged that opposition to this bill advertises that there is dissension in our ranks, and thus gives aid and comfort to the enemy.

The proposition if accepted ends both freedom of debate and freedom of vote. The functions of Congress are paralyzed. It is reduced to a mere board of registrars whose sole duty is to record the decrees of the Executive Department. This follows whether the mandate emanates from the brain of the President himself or from that of a subordinate clerk.

Furthermore, even though Congress may deem the Executive mandate unjust to the people and injurious to the State, it must, nevertheless, be recorded as the law of the land.

All these results follow if we concede the hypothesis that "to pause, to deliberate, to take counsel, to pass upon the merits of a proposed law," will give aid and comfort to the enemy.

Such a doctrine defeats the purpose for which Congress was created; deprives the people of their constitutional right to speak through legally constituted agents; centralizes all authority in the Executive; transforms our democracy into an oligarchy; and attacks the temple of liberty at its foundation.

The assertion that opposition to a measure by Members of Congress, who believe in its unwisdom, "renders aid and comfort to the enemy" is monstrous. There is no Member of this body who would not make any sacrifice, incur any displeasure, or suffer any penalty, rather than to wittingly render assistance to those who make war upon our beloved Republic.

What has transpired in the Senate, or outside the Senate, best calculated to give aid and comfort to the enemy? I put the question to you; I put it to the country; I put it to the press of the country. Let me answer by illustration:

If a distinguished German leader from his place in the Reichstag were to repeatedly denounce his fellow members as "American sympathizers, conspiring to accomplish the overthrow of the German Empire," would not America thrill with pleasure and confidence? Would not such a declaration strengthen our arms, stiffen our demands and inspire us to vigorously pursue the war until Germany should abjectly sue for peace?

When, therefore, in this Chamber it is asserted or intimated that a considerable body of Senators are deliberately giving aid and comfort to Germany, when such statements are repeated from day to day, when great newspapers print these Senatorial attacks and by news and editorial certify to all the world that there exists "a German party in Congress, backed by a powerful and seditious element among the people, which constantly seeks to harass, hamstring, handicap, and betray the United States," what must be the effect upon the German Government. Candor compels the answer that such assertions give to the enemy the most substantial aid and comfort he ever has or ever will receive from America. Moreover, the charges being monstrously false, infamously wicked, and criminally slanderous, their enormity is thereby infinitely magnified.

Mr. President, notwithstanding these intemperate charges, the indubitable truth remains that there is not as much disloyalty to America within all her vast borders as there is disloyalty to and hatred of the Kaiser within a single petty Province of the Empire of Germany.

Criminals exist in all communities. Idiots are indigenous to every clime. A certain percentage of unbalanced creatures come into the world each year. Accordingly we must expect to find among our 104,000,000 people a few misguided, half-balanced creatures who are not loyal to the Flag. But with the exceptions named there is no disloyalty.

The brain of America thrills with one impulse, the soul of America is inspired by one hope, the heart of America beats with one desire, the lips of America breathe but one prayer—that we may gloriously win this war, establish the primacy of Democracy, and prove to all races, kindreds, and peoples that the United States can and will defend her rights.

But, Mr. President, at such a time as this questions inevitably arise over which men of independent minds are likely to differ. Some of these questions relate to domestic, others to foreign policies.

Among the domestic problems may be mentioned these: Can we best strengthen the United States by leaving business free or by placing it in leading strings? Do the people of the United States really need a guardian or dictator to rule over them? Will industry and business free produce more than industry and business in chains? Springing from these as a corollary is the inquiry, How did we get along before Mr. Hoover came? What will we do when he returns to his English home?

Some foreign problems are: Should America try to revise the map of Europe? If so, to what extent? Should America try to force upon a foreign country a particular form of Government? Is it our business to try to democratize the world, or should we endeavor to maintain our own democracy? More serious than these is the question, Under what circumstances may we in honor insist upon peace?

In answering such questions men alike inspired by love of country may nevertheless disagree. This is especially true because the circumstances of the times are unprecedented and the ultimate answers lie largely within the uncertain future.

How men may honestly differ is illustrated by the fact that but a few moments since a distinguished Senator argued that "we owe Russia an obligation of support, because Russia is now following the principles we implanted."

I can not agree with my friend. We are in no way bound for Russia or to Russia. We are not responsible for the frontiers of foreign states. We are not answerable for the form of government established in European or Asiatic countries.

Whenever we shall receive full satisfaction for wrongs done and guaranties against future violation of our rights negotiations ought to begin. Of course we should not contemplate withdrawal from the conflict until whatever just obligations we may owe to our associates in arms have been faithfully discharged.

Let me add that I regard the discussion at this time of peace or the terms of peace as unfortunate. Such discussions will be accepted as evidence of weakness. The combatant who first asks for terms is generally regarded as ready to quit the fight.

A great European statesman declares "that good news may come in the near future." Let God speed the day! But until that good news shall come we should not pause to discuss the questions of peace. As long as the Kaiser, raging with the insanity of world conquest, clutches a reeking sword and chooses the part of world outlaw, so long as his spies lurk within American borders and his pirate ships harry American commerce, our proclamations should be made by acts. Each day should bring more guns, more men, more money, and more ships—still more—and more of armament, until even his passion-blinded eyes shall glimpse the vision of that day of bloody reckoning which is ahead, and to escape its retribution he shall cry for peace.

No sensible man familiar with the bill as it came here will deny that it needed discussion and amendment in order that its many absurdities might be eliminated.

I give but one illustration. The bill, as prepared by some wise subordinate in some Department, as introduced in the Senate, and as actually passed by the House, contained this laughable provision:

> That undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices of * * * necessaries are hereby prohibited.

Contemplate, if you please, the sagacity, learning, and care of the writer of a law who undertakes to deal with "prices" as he might with men. Think of Congress writing a law like this:

> Be it enacted that prices shall not rise.
> Be it further enacted that prices shall not change.

Why did not the House extend the beneficent scheme and provide:

> Be it enacted that it shall be unlawful for hunger or fever or disease to afflict mankind.

While we are forbidding "prices to fluctuate," why not prohibit the wind from changing, forbid drought, and command the rain to fall. Why not get rid of the measles, the mumps, the boll weevil, and chinch bugs by a statutory prohibition. If the intelligent author of this bill had written the Declaration of Independence, he would not have been satisfied with the assertion all men are entitled to "the pursuit of happiness," but would have inserted a clause commanding them to be happy.

After some debate we eliminated the foolish provision. We also made many radical changes. Much of the good we did has been nullified by the conferees. There, however, remains some beneficial features added by the Senate. The provision regulating the mining and marketing of coal was added here, and it was worth all the time consumed in the debate. That provision rests upon the sound doctrine that a business that has in fact combined thereby becomes subject to public control.

Mr. President, returning to my theme and proceeding from the undeniable proposition that it is our duty to bring to every measure untrammeled judgment, I inquire what just complaint can be lodged against the Senate touching the consideration of this so-called food dictator bill?

There are those who believe the bill will strengthen the United States in the present war. It is their duty to support it. But there are other Senators who feel certain that the bill will weaken the United States. Is it not their duty to resist its passage?

Regarding the bill as seriously impairing our national strength, I must therefore contend against it or betray the trust I hold from the people of my great State.

A vote upon this bill is not a test of loyalty. It may be a test of soundness of judgment.

Those who oppose the bill are not influenced by petty reasons. They act in obedience to the most weighty considerations. They want success for America in this war. They believe the bill weakens us at an hour when we ought to "increase and multiply our strength."

It is conceded that to win the war we must command the vastest sums of money ever gathered by any government.

We must produce food to feed half the world.

We must wave the wand of industry above countless farms and command the miracle of double crops.

We must touch growing forests and change them into argosies that bear our products to Europe's distant shores.

We must lay the finger of magic upon mines where gross metals sleep and transform them into frowning cannon and deadly shells.

We must darken the firmaments above the capitals of our enemies with resistless fleets of the air and astound their ears by the artillery of the skies.

Coincident with the execution of these herculean tasks millions of peaceful citizens must be converted into skilled warriors who play the game of life and death with intrepid souls.

To work this enchantment every man must be encouraged to produce the essentials of life, as well as the instruments of death.

The wheels of factories must hum through every hour of the twenty-four. The furnaces of mills must send their blazing challenge into the night. Gold must be gathered in vaster hoards than man has ever seen in all the course of time.

It is therefore a poor time to menace the man who produces. It is a mistake to disturb industry. It is a blunder to hang a threat over business. It is suicide to discourage agriculture.

When you seize the markets of the country you stifle production. If it be the labor market, you dishearten the workman. If it be the agricultural market, you dismay the farmer. If it be the manufacturing market, you alarm the mill owner. If it be credits, you invite panic.

All of these acts impede or arrest the delicate and intricate machinery of production.

Dictators are not yet so common as to inspire confidence. Lack of confidence produces industrial paralysis. A panic at this time might be fatal to our arms.

Holding these views, I have insisted and still insist that our legislation should be confined to the prevention of those acts which obstruct the markets of the people, which interfere with the free flow of commerce.

Among these are "forestalling," "hoarding," "gambling," "restraints of trade"—all such evil devices should be sternly prohibited and rigidly punished.

But the great people of this mighty land should be encouraged to bend their efforts to create a vast surplus. The man who does not know that profits are the universal solvent for universal effort is dull indeed.

All this seems so plain as to be axiomatic. Yet, sir, this bill as reported by the conferees seeks to create in the Executive the arbitrary authority to command that citizens shall cease using their private property for purposes recognized as legal since Magna Charta.

The bill recites:

Whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries * * * and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed * * * carry on such business * * * unless he shall secure and hold a license.

While the vast powers of the bill are lodged in the President, they will be exercised by men many of whose names are not even now known to the public, if, indeed, they are to the President.

The power is to be exercised without any pretense of compensation. It is not dependent upon the ascertainment of any fact. All that is required is that "the President shall find it essential," which is merely the equivalent of "whenever the President shall see fit."

The power does not rest upon any finding of misconduct on the part of the proprietor of the property. It springs alone from the Executive will. Its motive force is a simple Executive impulse.

The formality of service of notice is not required. A "public announcement" is sufficient. A newspaper interview is probably all that is demanded.

Whereupon this occurs: The man who has spent his life in creating a business, and who thinks he owns it—the man who has painfully, rock by rock, built a mill from the ground up and believes himself proprietor—the man who in sweat and toil has established a great factory and who fondly regards it as his own—picks up a morning paper and reads "a public announcement" that he must take out a license or close his business.

If he fails to obey the mandate and dares to enter his own premises and set in motion a single wheel, he may be sent to the penitentiary.

If, however, he shall yield to compulsion and take out a license, is he then permitted to conduct his business in accordance with the law of the land? Ah, no! He must conduct it in accordance with the terms and conditions fixed by Executive will. His books of account are taken from him and those of the Government substituted. An auditor may pry into his private business affairs. A federal inspector may invade his private premises by day or by night. He may be compelled under oath to report his private transactions to a federal understrapper.

Moreover, he has waived his right as a free man to fix the value of his services or property and must accept the price fixed by the President. If, forsooth, he shall venture in violation of any regulation, however arbitrary or unjust, to conduct his own business in his own way, or if he shall fail to obey the orders of those placed over him, again is he haled before a United States Commissioner, clapped into jail, and finally securely landed in a federal prison.

That is the taking of private property without due process of law.

I unhesitatingly say that the Federal Government can not come to the mill of a citizen and declare, "If you turn another wheel, you will be sent to the penitentiary unless you first take out a license and thereupon you shall conduct your business in the manner and for the prices the Government may stipulate."

I unhesitatingly say that is depriving the citizen of his property without just compensation, because when a citizen is deprived of the right to the control and enjoyment of his property he is "deprived of his property."

I also say that whether the bill is constitutional or unconstitutional it will at least alarm business, discourage agriculture, lessen production, and may breed panic.

In the flood tide of his power Frederick The Great began the construction of his country lodge of Sans-Souci. Victor over Austria, Dictator of the Peace of Dresden, he had established himself the foremost martial figure of the world. In providing grounds for the King's Gardens his agents sought to purchase a bit of land on which was located the windmill of an old Potsdam miller.

He refused "to sell at any price." "Not at any price?" said the King's agent. "Can not the King take it from you for nothing if he chooses?" Proudly the old man answered, "Not while we have at Berlin the Kammergericht"—the Supreme Court of Justice.

The autocrat of Prussia dared not take by force the old miller's estate. Accordingly he expressed delight that his sturdy subject reposed such confidence in the integrity of Prussian courts. The mill of Potsdam was thereafter regarded as an ornament to the Gardens of the King, because a monument of the King's justice.

Let us ponder this page torn from Prussian history.

ARBITRARY LEGISLATION UNNECESSARY.

The enactment of legislation of this arbitrary and unconstitutional character is wholly unnecessary. It lacks even the poor excuse that it is "intended to prevent speculation, gambling, and hoarding." In proof I cite the following from the records of Congress:

More than eight weeks ago we passed the "food survey bill." It came to us from the House of Representatives as "an emergency measure." Its chief purposes were to ascertain the condition of our food supplies and to encourage the planting of a large crop for the present year.

For those reasons we rushed it through the Senate in three days' time. But we added two stringent amendments which, taken together, rigidly prohibited and severely punished food gambling and food hoarding. We authorized the President, if necessary to prevent speculation or gambling, to close every grain exchange in the land. We returned the bill to the House of Representatives. It has been held in conference more than eight weeks.

I openly and upon the floor of the Senate charge that the bill was pigeonholed in response to the outrageous demand of a member of the Cabinet, who stated in substance that if the food survey bill was permitted to become a law before the food dictatorship bill was passed the chief arguments in favor of the latter bill would be eliminated.

And so the food survey bill, which we were told was one of highest emergency, has been strangled for more than two months. Important information relating to the condition of our food supplies has not yet been gathered. The season for planting crops has been allowed to pass.

But, sir, the moment the Senate conferees abjectly surrender to the House conferees on the pending measure, the food survey bill is reported out of conference, and is now here waiting the mere form of ratification to become a law.

AGAIN, MR. PRESIDENT, IF THE POWERS CONVEYED BY THIS BILL ARE EMPLOYED, IT WILL DEPRIVE THE FARMER OF THE LAST VESTIGE OF A FREE MARKET IN WHICH TO SELL WHAT HE PRODUCES. AT THE SAME TIME HE WILL BE COMPELLED TO BUY IN A MARKET WHERE WAR PRICES PREVAIL.

The result indicated springs from the fact that the embargo law and the enforcement thereof, together with the action of the Allied Governments, have already placed the control of all wheat exports in the "Wheat Export Co." That company is, in fact, a syndicate or corporation comprised of English concerns. Thus to-day an English company exercises a complete monopolistic control over America's foreign grain markets. It therefore has the power to fix the price of every bushel of wheat raised on American farms which is sent abroad.

Let it not be forgotten that Mr. Hoover counseled, aided, and abetted the organization of this English monopoly. The fact I have hitherto charged. The proof I have hitherto produced from Mr. Hoover's own testimony. The fact will not be here denied. I challenge denial at this time. There are none to stand forth and dispute the truth of my assertion.

Having thus taken away the farmer's foreign market, the food dictator is by this bill granted authority and power to seize and control the domestic market.

By employing the licensing provision he may bring all the mills, elevators, and grain exchanges within his control. On top of this he is furnished with $150,000,000 of Government money for the express purpose of going into the market and controlling prices. Indeed, it is no longer concealed, although the fact was for a long time disputed, that the food dictator, acting in conjunction with the English Wheat Export Co., will be able to arbitrarily fix the price of every bushel of grain raised upon the farms of America.

THE FARMER IS THEREFORE DEPENDENT FOR THE PRICE OF HIS GRAIN CROP UPON THE WILL OF ONE MAN. AS THAT MAN SHALL DICTATE, THE 45,000,000 PEOPLE ENGAGED IN AGRICULTURE IN THE UNITED STATES MAY BE BLESSED WITH PROSPERITY OR REDUCED TO BANKRUPTCY.

I protest therefore that the bill is highly injurious to the country. It will discourage agriculture at the very moment when we most need to encourage the production of great crops.

It was for the purpose of protecting the farmer against injustice by a food dictator that we have contended for a price guaranteed by the law. We believed this necessary as an act of justice and also because the farmer, appalled by the fact that the price of his wheat is to be arbitrarily dictated by one man, in all probability will reduce his acreage. We sought and obtained a legislative guaranty of $2 per bushel on this year's crop. We believed that good prices this year would result in a larger crop next year.

But the conferees, without consulting a single Senator from a wheat-growing State, and, I believe in response to influences emanating from Mr. Hoover, have changed the guaranty so that it does not apply until next year. This year's production is left to the mercy of the food dictator and the English syndicate.

MR. HOOVER—DICTATOR.

Who, pray, is this food dictator? A gentleman recently arrived from England who brought with him a hired press agent and a number of English gentlemen. Perhaps, to be accurate, I should say, "of Americans who have lived so long in England that one feels warranted in referring to them as English." To this gentleman, who left America at the age of 23, whose house, home, business, interests, and fortune are in England; who probably has never paid a dollar of taxes in the United States; who has not in over 20 years cast a vote in the United States; who is not now a qualified voter of the United States; who is politically so much of an Englishman that he describes himself, not as a Democrat or Republican, but as a "Liberal," we are about to turn over 45,000,000 people engaged in agriculture. He may, if he graciously chooses, make them prosperous. He may, if he so wills, reduce many of them to bankruptcy.

Even if this autocrat we set over the farmers of America shall fix a price for wheat which is fair, the fact, nevertheless, remains that we have deprived 45,000,000 citizens of their free markets. We have given one man arbitrary power over the destiny and fortunes of many freemen.

To the American who understands the principles for which our fathers fought, arbitrary power is none the less hateful because it may be for the moment benevolently exercised. The presence of a master with his whip enrages although the lash may never cut the skin.

Senators, you may force this bill through, but I warn you that when you alarm the farmer you reduce the bread supply of the cities. That, sir, is a most serious mistake. Such is my opinion. Such is the opinion of others.

I shall vote in accordance with my opinion. There are many here who believe as I believe, who yet will, for considerations which they see fit to regard as controlling, vote for the bill. I shall not criticize them. Let them answer to their own consciences. But let none such dare charge me with disloyalty.

ARBITRARY POWER GIVEN TO ONE MAN.

Mr. President, in order to escape the dangers necessarily incident to dictatorships, the Senate provided an administrative board of three men. Our conferees have incontinently surrendered the provision. The producers of the country are to be turned over to one man, a man who has with unparalled temerity assumed to exercise authority which has not yet been granted, and who now with a reckless and lavish hand is spending hundreds of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money before the office he pretends to usurp has even been created.

We are to have no check upon that man. No one is to sit with him or scrutinize the things he may do.

When we protest that such power is unsafe we are told that we are "interfering with administrative functions." I deny it. We are now engaged in creating an agency and prescribing its powers. The powers when granted will be executive, but the act of creating the agency and prescribing its powers is purely legislative. It is our business to see to it that the powers granted shall be so restricted and guarded that the rights of the people shall not be invaded.

We therefore have the right—nay, it is our duty—to insist that if these vast powers must be granted they be conferred upon a board to the end that the country may have the benefit of the united judgment of several men and that each member may act as a check upon the others.

AUDITING COMMITTEE REJECTED.

As the bill left the Senate it created a committee to see that the taxpayers' money should be spent providently and in accordance with law. That wholesome provision has been stricken out. No sound argument has been advanced in support of the action of the conferees. No honest man connected with any department ought to object to accounting for every penny by him expended.

The necessity for such a committee is just now imperative. If we are to have a dictator like Mr. Hoover; if we are to place in his hands millions of dollars of the public funds; if we are to authorize him to buy and sell, to barter and to trade, to organize a force of agents unlimited in number, to pay salaries as he may see fit, to rent quarters the size of which have not been specified, to pursue a course of conduct laid out by himself for himself, surely the least we can do is to create a committee to ascertain where and how the taxpayers' money have been expended.

Likewise, if we are to pour out thousands of millions of dollars in this conflict, surely it can do no harm to examine the accounts of those who handle these unprecedented sums. Yet, in obedience to demands coming from outside this body, our conferees have consented to strike this wholesome provision from the bill.

Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], in a great speech, uttered this great truth:

If we are to win this war the greatest asset we can have is the confidence and enthusiastic support of the people.

I agree with that statement. Given the enthusiastic confidence and support of the people, given competent generals to command the army, this nation is invincible against all the forces of earth. You talk about Germany coming here and conquering the United States! I have listened to that kind of twaddle until my gorge has risen. Germany cross the Atlantic Ocean and conquer the United States!

The lesson of all history is that no army can go thousands of miles from its base of supplies and conquer a great, powerful, and brave people upon their own soil.

For centuries English kings attempted the conquest of France. They failed not so much from French valor as because they fought too far from their base of supplies.

At a time when his fleets swept every sea, and his treasure galleys bore the gold of every land, Philip II undertook the conquest of England. But his invincible Armada became victim of ocean storms and the intrepidity of Sir Francis Drake. Philip fought too far from his base of supplies.

The veterans of Napoleon hurled back the hosts of the Czar, only to retreat before the invisible legions of winter and hunger—two enemies human valor can not withstand. Napoleon fought too far from his base of supplies.

France established Maximilian on the throne of Mexico. But Maximilian went to execution. The French undertook a task too far from their base of supplies.

Why, sir, with a population aggregating 350,000,000 it took the British Empire three years to conquer the two little South African colonies of Boerland, whose people numbered but 1,300,000 souls. The answer to the riddle is England's army fought too far from its base of supplies.

Have we forgotten that with British soldiers quartered in their homes, British fortresses frowning above their cities, British fleets riding in their harbors, the American colonies, possessing not a single soldier, a single cannon, or a single ship of war, with naked hands wrested their liberties from the most puissant power of earth?

I affrm, sir, that the sons of the frontiersmen who fought at Lexington, of the patriots who starved at Valley Forge, of the veterans who conquered at Yorktown, are not degenerate.

I unhesitatingly declare that the mighty America of to-day can range her hosts upon her seagirt shores and hurl back into the ocean the united armies of earth. Give us a little time to prepare and they will never land a single division of troops, or if they do, it will be but to march into the open jaws of death.

Time for preparation we now have had. The work is far advanced. As it proceeds the German nation is hemmed in by fire and steel—a living wall of valiant enemies who mock at death and wait in eagerness the hour when vengeance shall be theirs. Against these invincible lines German valor breaks as break the ocean waves upon the eternal rocks, and like the waves rolls back foaming in impotent fury.

Besides, sir, were Germany to accomplish the impossible, and lay her conquering sword across every capital in Europe; were she then to seek vengeance upon us, her armies would not have left Europe's shores until her ancient enemies, mad with the shame of defeat, smarting from German blows, would leap upon her flanks and drag her down, as furious hounds drag down the stag already weak from loss of blood. The "German Invader" is a bogie man that should frighten none but children.

> And it guards the bed of the brave who are dead

Mr. President, has it come to this: That a Member can not upon the floor of the Senate express the opinion that a certain measure makes for the weakness of his country instead of for its strength without some braying animal somewhere in some town or some State—of course, it never gets in the Senate—in discordant voice roars out, "You are the enemy of the United States"?

THE SCROLL OF INFAMY.

Is agreement with everything the President may suggest the test of loyalty to country? Do you dare make that the test? If so, we have already lost the war. The country is surrendered and our honor gone.

Why, let us see where we will end with such a test as that. The President insistently demanded press censorship. The Congress of the United States said "No." By the test you propose that fact proves the disloyalty of a majority of the members of Congress. Was Congress disloyal? Ah, no! It but expressed the patriotic opinion of men who love their country and its Constitution and believe that the best way to fight this war is with an untrammeled press. I so voted then; I so believe now.

Again, although the President openly protested, both Houses of Congress voted to inject the prohibition question into this bill. Do you dare affirm that because a majority of the members of Congress differed from the President on prohibition they are therefore traitorous rogues? If so, I can unite the names of those who voted for prohibition to those who favored freedom of the press and prove that 80 per cent of both Houses are disloyal.

Your argument, my friends, proves quite too much. The net you spread may catch the feet of those who come accusing others. The names of the "holier than thou" may yet be found in the ignominious list. For behold a majority of this Senate decisively declared against a single food dictator. Those who so voted had full knowledge of the fact that the President insisted on a single man. Were they therefore disloyal? If so, and their illustrious names must be added to the long list of rogues I have already held up to your view, I fear it will now embrace nearly all members of the Senate.

Still more, it was of common understanding that the President opposed the creation of an auditing committee, yet a majority of the Senate voted in the teeth of his insistence. Why, sir, messengers repeatedly came, as came the Senator from Wisconsin this morning, oppressed with the weighty burden of administration advice, yet a majority of the Senate impudently insisted that it was our duty to see that the people's money be honestly expended. If the test of loyalty is blind obedience, then here are others whose names must be written in dishonor's growing scroll.

Even yet the case is not complete. At the instance of the Senator from New Hampshire, a majority of the Senate voted to exempt labor organizations from the bill's drastic penalties. The conferees have stricken the exemption out, for did not some one "in hot haste bring tidings from the administration"? Accordingly it now appears that all who voted to exclude labor from the terms of the bill are likewise traitors. Even the Senator from New Hampshire, who has so long been a faithful servitor, will be astonished to discover his name far down upon the list of the disloyal.

Why, Mr. President, upon the brazen cheek of impudence shame's hot flame must burn when in this Chamber Senators are denounced because, instead of yielding a ready acquiescence to every Executive demand, they insist upon employing their best judgment in the performance of their legislative duties.

The men who sit about me represent great commonwealths, mighty States, whose teeming millions constitute the puissant citizenry of the Republic. We hold our powers from the people. We are trustees of a great and sacred trust. The warrant of our authority is the Constitution; by it we are bound in law; to it we are bound by honor and by oath. When we transfer to another the powers and responsibilities the Constitution imposes upon us we subvert the rights of the people. We betray those who sent us here to guard their rights. Who gives consent to breaking down the form and structure of our Government is traitor to America—assassin of liberty.

It follows we must employ the best judgment we possess. If it shall sometimes run counter to the desire or ambition of others, we must nevertheless continue to do that which we believe makes for the highest interest of the State. Senators may, if they see fit, pursue an opposite course. I do not challenge either their right or their good faith. For myself, I decline to confuse sycophancy with patriotism, to mistake cringing for statesmanship, or to confound abdication with service.

Mr. President, I make bold to suggest that it may help win this war if Members of Congress extend to each other that decent respect due to membership in a great body. I employ the term "great" because Congress has been constituted by the greatest people of earth; because Congress is the only instrumentality through which that great people may speak their sentiments by legislative acts. Doubtless Members of this Congress are less efficient than their critics. But for the present they are here charged with the grave responsibility of legislating. That responsibility they can not shirk. That duty they may not transfer to another without violence to the Republic.

Mr. President, why this miserable cavil and all the time criticism? What has Congress done to merit it? Does the editor think—the statesman believe—the critic imagine he helps his country by going up and down the earth declaring that the "Congress is foolish, incompetent, disloyal, recreant to duty"? Would not the Kaiser get less comfort if he were told that Congress is patriotically toiling night and day to strengthen our defenses and create invincible armies that will speedily work his destruction?

Let us see what has been done. As we proceed we shall be convinced that in all history no free legislative body has ever rendered to King or President a more ardent, prompt, and efficient cooperation in war measures than this Congress has accorded the President of the United States. I shall not endeavor to recite the complete record. A reference to the more important acts will prove abundantly sufficient.

When the European war broke upon the world and the President declared "for strict neutrality," Congress put a padlock on its lips and remained silent even when Belgium was invaded; when the death cries of the Lusitania's victims rang in the ears of the world; when American ships were finding graves at the ocean's bottom.

More than a year before we declared war upon Germany, while we were yet pursuing a policy of nonintervention and inditing paeans to peace, at the mere suggestion of the President Congress revolutionized our traditional policy of a small Army and Navy. The willingness of Congress to thus cooperate was evidenced by numerous important acts.

March 17, 1916, witnessed the passage of the Army reorganization bill, which authorized the President to increase the Regular Army from 90,000 to 290,000 and raise the militia to 457,000.

It provided for the organization of machine-gun companies; increase in the Medical, Signal, Engineer, and Quartermaster Corps.

The Ordnance Department was vastly strengthened.

Officers were provided for training the National Guard and students of colleges and schools.

The following new organizations were created: Officers' Reserve Corps, Officers' Training Corps, Enlisted Reserve Corps, Citizens' Training Corps.

Provision was made for a vast extension of the aerial service at a cost of over $13,000,000.

The foregoing program involved the unprecedented amount of $267,579,000 for the first year.

At the same time the President was authorized to draft the National Guard into military service for the period of any war.

The President was by the same bill empowered in time of war or imminent danger to order any factory to make anything it could produce and to compel it to give his order precedence over all other business; to order all ammunition factories to produce the kind of arms and ammunition desired; to compel the owners of factories to transform them into ammunition plants; to force owners of factories to sell their products at prices determined by the Secretary of War. If satisfactory prices were not given, to seize the plant.

Failure to obey any of these commands was made punishable by a fine of $50,000 and imprisonment for three years.

Authority was granted the President to appoint a board for the mobilization of industries essential for military preparedness.

A board to report on the feasibility of the Government manufacturing arms and ammunition was authorized.

A Government nitrate plant was authorized and $20,000,000 appropriated to pay the bill.

July 1, 1916, Congress declared an emergency and gave the President full authority to draft the entire National Guard. On the same date it passed a bill carrying the following important appropriations for improvement of the permanent Military Establishment:

To create a powder factory, $500,000.

For additional facilities for manufacturing field artillery, $1,000,000.

For additional capacity for manufacturing gun carriages, $500,000.

For additional capacity for manufacturing armor-plate projectiles, $215,000.

For improvement of military posts in Hawaii, $1,000,000.

For seacoast defenses, $420,000.

Altogether the bill carried approximately $8,000,000, largely for new works or permanent betterments.

July 6, 1916, authority was granted to spend for purchase of seacoast cannon, $540,000;

For purchase and test of ammunition for seacoast cannon, $2,200,000; and

For purchase of tools, and so forth, for manufacture of arms, and so forth, $1,000,000.

At the same time enormous additional appropriations were made.

August 29, 1916, provision was made to improve and equip for the construction of war vessels the navy yards at Puget Sound, Philadelphia, Norfolk, New York, Boston, Portsmouth, Charleston, and New Orleans, and $6,000,000 was appropriated.

A naval program great beyond all precedents was entered upon. By it the construction of 157 vessels was authorized at a cost of $588,180,576. This was nearly five times the average annual appropriation under any of Mr. Wilson's predecessors.

The naval program above specified has since been increased to embrace 204 vessels, at a total cost of $618,600,000.

In addition there are now being built out of the naval emergency fund 85 destroyers, tugs, and mine sweepers, at an estimated cost of $67,000,000.

Approximately 350 submarine chasers, at an estimated cost of $26,320,000.

Ordnance stores and materials have been provided, at a cost of $379,000,000.

The enlisted strength of the Navy—exclusive of the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia—has been increased from 51,500 to 150,000.

August 29, 1916, number of cadets at West Point and Annapolis was increased 50 per cent.

On the same date, with an almost lavish hand, Congress made appropriations carrying out a great scheme of preparedness. I cite but a few:

For automatic machine rifles for the Army, $6,000,000.

For automatic machine rifles for the National Guard, $6,000,000.

For Army motors, $500,000.

For manufacturing field artillery for National Guard, $10,000,000.

For manufacturing reserve ammunition for field artillery for National Guard, $10,000,000.

To provide camps for instruction of National Guard, $500,000.

For a projectile plant, $1,411,000.

For an armor-plate factory, $11,000,000.

For batteries for merchant auxiliaries, $3,300,000.

For reserve ordnance supplies, $4,500,000.

For Navy aeronautic station at Pensacola, Fla., $420,000.

For stocks and docks at Norfolk, $1,242,000.

For dry dock at Hawaii. $700,000.

For depots for coal at various foreign ports, $460,000.

A total for public works of $8,350,000 was appropriated.

Provision was made for—

Organization of a complete naval flying corps;

Organizing complete naval reserve forces;

Organization of naval auxiliary reserve;

Organization of naval coast defense reserve;

Organization of naval reserve flying corps;

Organization of Marine Corps Reserve;

Organization of Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers; and Establishment of Marine Corps training camps.

The President was given express authority to assume control, take possession of, and to utilize to the exclusion of all other traffic for the transfer of war materials, troops, and so forth, all systems of transportation. This includes that vast network of railroads which covers like a spider's web the United States, comprising a mileage greater than the total railroad mileage of all Europe.

At the same time a Council of National Defense was created, with authority to choose an advisory commission to coordinate industries and resources of the entire Nation for the purpose of the national security and welfare.

Having made all this preparation for war, Congress on the same date, evidently to complete the program by covering all possible phases of the question, authorized the President to call a conference of all the nations of the world to create a court of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes and to provide for universal disarmament. To this end the President was empowered to appoint members of such tribunal and given $200,000 to pay their expenses.

March 4, 1917, the last day of the old Congress, the naval program was further increased by the addition of 18 torpedo boats, at a cost of $6,115,000. Twenty-six coast submarines were authorized, to cost $50,000,000.

The President was given authority to expend, in his discretion, in order to secure more expeditious delivery of materials, $215,000,000.

The President was authorized to order ships built or war materials from any person capable of producing the same.

The acceptance and filling of such orders was made obligatory and to be given precedence over all other orders or contracts.

Failure to accept such order and give such preference or supply materials at the price fixed by the President authorizes the President to take immediate possession of the factory and to operate it as he sees fit.

The President was also given authority to modify or cancel any existing contract for the building or production of ships or war materials, and if the contractor refuses to obey, the President may take immediate possession of his factory or plant.

The President was further authorized to requisition and take over any factory of any kind or any part of such factory at any place in the United States for the purpose of producing war materials. This authority continues until March 1, 1918.

The President was likewise authorized in certain contingencies to expend $12,000,000 to equip a navy yard in order to produce any of the ships authorized.

JANUARY 22, 1917, THE SENATE ENTHUSIASTICALLY CHEERED THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS IN WHICH HE DECLARED FOR "PEACE WITHOUT VICTORY."

TWELVE DAYS LATER, FEBRUARY 3, THE ENTIRE CONGRESS RECEIVED WITH VOCIFEROUS APPLAUSE THE PRESIDENT'S ANNOUNCEMENT OF A SEVERANCE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH GERMANY.

APRIL 2 THE SAME CONGRESS AGAIN SHOOK THE CAPITOL WITH CHEERS FOR THE PRESIDENT'S DEMAND FOR WAR.

WITHIN THREE DAYS THEREAFTER—APRIL 5—CONGRESS PASSED THE MOMENTOUS RESOLUTION WHICH PLUNGED US INTO THAT MIGHTY CONFLICT WHICH IN ITSELF EXCEEDS ALL THE WARS OF ALL HISTORY.

APRIL 17, 1917 (AS I RECOLLECT, WITHOUT A DEBATE OF EVEN FIVE MINUTES), CONGRESS GAVE THE PRESIDENT AUTHORITY TO EXPEND AS HE SAW FIT $100,000,000.

April 24 Congress gave the President authority to issue $7,000,000,000 of bonds and certificates of indebtedness. The bill was passed by the House three days after it was introduced. It reached the Senate on April 16 and was passed April 17.

This is the most stupendous sum of money ever placed at the disposal of any earthly Prince, King, Czar, Kaiser, Emperor, or President. It was justly put at the disposition of the President without hesitancy, without opposition, almost without debate. It was at once a vote of confidence in the President and a proclamation of the willingness of Congress to wage the war with every resource of the land until our enemies shall lie prostrate.

In pursuit of the same policy of hearty cooperation on various dates Congress passed acts conferring upon the President most extraordinary and far-reaching powers.

May 12, 1917, the President was authorized to seize all vessels belonging to citizens of enemy nations.

May 18 the President was authorized to draft approximately 1,250,000 men, including the entire National Guard, bringing the total of the Army to over 2,000,000.

June 15 espionage prohibited and punished by stringent act.

The President was granted absolute control over movements of all vessels, foreign and domestic, in territorial waters of the United States, with right to take possession of the same.

On the same date injury to foreign vessels prohibited under severe penalties. Interference with or obstruction of exportation to foreign countries prohibited and punished.

The neutrality act was passed on this date, authorizing the President to withhold clearance of vessels carrying supplies or information to belligerent nations, also authorizing detention of any armed vessel, domestic or foreign, coming within the waters of the United States.

The President was further authorized to seize arms and ammunition intended for export.

June 15 witnessed the passage of the embargo act whereby the President was authorized to prohibit exportations from the United States to any or all countries named in his proclamation except at such times and under such regulations as he may fix, and also empowered to refuse clearance to any vessel, domestic or foreign, carrying such goods.

June 15 Congress, at the request of the administration, passed an act to prevent disturbance of foreign relations. This act prohibited willful misstatements calculated to influence the conduct of any foreign government to the injury of the United States. The act further penalized offenses calculated to interfere with the diplomatic relations, and so forth; punished making false application for passport and counterfeiting of Government seals. The act also provided for a drastic use of search warrants and denied the use of the mails to the publications carrying any matter prohibited by the act.

All of the foregoing measures of date June 15 were considered in one act known as the espionage bill.

June 15 Congress authorized the President to order from any person ships and materials; to suspend or cancel or requisition any ships building or built; to require the owner of any plant to place at the disposal of the Government any part of his output.

On the same date the right of the President to requisition all ships, shipyards, plants capable of producing materials for ships; to cancel all existing contracts, and generally to take over all and everything necessary to the immediate construction of a navy was renewed and extended.

The President was further authorized to expend in building an emergency merchant fleet $750,000,000.

Enormous appropriations were made for the coast defense aggregating $621,000,000.

It was the general opinion in Congress that these enormous grants of power and money were all that could be desired, but the administration concluded it to be advisable to build the greatest aviation fleet ever conceived by the brain of man. It asked for $640,000,000. When the bill came before the Military Committee I had the honor to suggest that, although it contained many provisions objectionable to the members of the committee, we should nevertheless report it out immediately, so that the work of construction could begin without delay. The bill was so reported, every man on the committee waiving his objections. It was held here in the Senate at the instance of some Senators, who merely desired time to read the bill; it was held for that purpose only. Within two days' time it was called up by the Chairman and passed with less than 50 minutes of debate and no dissenting vote.

Other staggering sums, possibly aggregating $10,000,000,000, will be soon demanded. There has not thus far been a hint of Congressional opposition. On the contrary, there is a complete concert of opinion that the sinews of war must be furnished without limit.

For weeks the Finance Committee of the Senate has been bending to the difficult task of preparing a bill that will raise the immense revenues necessary. There has been no disposition to shirk responsibility or to evade the full performance of the very unpleasant duty. When the bill gets here it will be scrutinized, debated, and possibly improved. In any event, during the grilling days of August, Members of Congress are bending every effort to produce the best results possible.

This, Mr. President, is what I call backing up the President.

We have given him every soldier, every ship, and every dollar he has asked.

We have given him every cannon, every fortress, every shipyard he has requested.

We have given him authority to commandeer the railways and lines of transportation.

We have authorized him to seize great factories, requisition mighty plants, and to summon at will almost the entire resources of the country.

If we do our full duty, we must give him one more thing—our honest counsel. If we do not give him that we are recreant to our trust. If we do not give him that, then have we betrayed the American people. If we do not give him that and failure shall come in this great war, then will the disaster be justly chargeable upon us, because we have not dealt honestly with the President or with the country. But if all shall do their part as God gives to them the light, then, fellow Senators, we will not fail.

Never before have I witnessed the spectacle of Senators upon the floor declaring a measure "unwise," "unsound," "of doubtful constitutionality," "uncertain in its effects," and yet asserting their intent to vote for it.

Some Senators find solace in the statement that by so voting they pass the responsibility on to the President. Ah, Senators, that is a grave mistake. We can not thus shirk the responsibility we owe our country. We can not thus transfer our responsibility to the shoulders of the President.

Loyalty to the country consists in giving it honest service. Loyalty to the President demands honest counsel. The curse of great men is the sycophancy of courtiers.

I have contended bitterly against this bill because I regarded it as injurious. I thought it my duty to so contend; I still think it my duty.

I look confidently to the future for complete vindication. Even now I think I have the vindication of your judgment; for that I have made an honest contention and have tried only to serve my country and my State.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, it occurred to me a moment ago that I would not be true to the sentiments I entertain if I did not transmit a note of congratulation to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. But so deeply do I feel gratitude to him as a Member of this body that I thought it more manly to openly say that I feel highly gratified and much uplifted by his splendid vindication of the honor of the Senate, of independent thought, and of free speech.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Secretary to read the telegram I send to the desk in order that it may go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., August 8, 1917.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Coal mine workers of the United States are deeply concerned over Pomerene coal amendment to food bill, because fixing of selling price of coal and the probable fixing of wages will greatly affect miners. In behalf of miners we ask that President be given authority to employ such agency as he may wish in arriving at selling price of coal and operation of mines. We are unalterably opposed to Federal Trade Commission being given exclusive right to fix selling price of coal. Justice demands that the million men who mine the Nation's coal supply be given representation on any board having authority to fix selling price of coal and arrange for probable governmental operation of mines. We petition that provision be inserted in coal amendment providing for representation of miners on boards which are authorized to fix selling price of coal.

JOHN P. WHITE,
President,
FRANK J. HAYES,
Vice President,
WM. GREEN,
Secretary-Treasurer,
United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I avail myself of the few remaining moments, if no one else seeks the floor, to state my regret that the provision adopted by the Senate preserving the right of peaceful combination and collective action of employees under the Clayton Act was eliminated by the conferees from the bill. I wish to say that I have supported a measure for limiting the power of strikes of railroad operators, conditioned, however, upon the creation of a tribunal for the adjustment of differences between employers and employees. I have thus far limited the legislation which I have sought to have enacted upon that subject to the common carriers of the country upon the ground that the public interest requires that the interchange of products should at no time and under no contingency be paralyzed; that the use of railroads is a public use and the service of railroads is a public service which at no time should be interrupted by disputes between the carriers and their employees.

But I do not believe that the legislation of the Clayton Act, in which the questions of labor strikes and labor injunctions were fully debated and determined, should be affected in any way by indirection. To my regret the Senate thus far has been unwilling and the Congress has been unwilling to enter upon the consideration of any adequate legislation with reference to limiting the power of strikes on railroads; but I want to meet the matter squarely upon its merits in a well-balanced bill preserving the rights of both the public and the employees, and not to attempt to secure partial results by indirection.

A reading of section 4 of the bill indicates to me that the contention may well be made—I do not insist that it will be successfully made—that that section does limit and restrain the power of strikes. If it does accomplish that purpose, the result will have been secured by indirection and not by squarely meeting the question in open debate in Congress.

I shall vote for the adoption of the conference report, because matters involved in this bill are of large moment, and action, in my judgment, should not be delayed, but I hope that before long some resolution will be adopted by the Congress which will indicate that it does not favor legislation by indirection, and that section 4 is not intended to affect the labor provisions of the Clayton Act. I would much prefer to meet the whole question squarely upon the recommendations of the President made at the time of the last strike, with reference to which Congress thus far has taken only partial action.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I intended, if the opportunity had been afforded me to-day, to discuss some of the provisions of this bill, also its policy and expediency, and to give some attention to the legal questions involved in this proposed legislation, including the matter just referred to by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I listened with deep interest to the excellent legal argument made a day or two ago by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], in which he contended that he could not support the conference report because the conferees had stricken out sections 6 and 26 of the bill as it passed the Senate. His contention was that section 4 of this bill, as reported by the conference committee, would make it an offense for employees to strike or quit their employment. During his remarks I ventured to express dissent from the views announced by him, and to suggest that, as I interpreted the bill, it did not repeal existing law relating to labor unions and employees, and did not challenge the right of employees to strike, and that the provisions of section 4 would not be construed to include employees. I stated also, as I remember, that the bill in its present form did not, in my opinion, modify or repeal the provisions of sections 6 and 20 of the so-called Clayton Act.

Upon further investigation and more mature reflection I am confirmed in the view then briefly expressed. Owing to the fact that, under the unanimous-consent agreement, a vote will be taken within a few moments, I have no time to discuss the legal phases of this question. I venture to suggest, however, that this bill will not be construed to include within its terms employees who may strike or leave their employment. The purpose of the bill is primarily directed against the hoarding of foods and the control of coal and food supplies. It is not concerned with transportation or labor or the questions involved in a consideration of those subjects. It seems clear to me that this bill does not repeal any provisions of the so-called Clayton Act, and would not reach individuals who might leave their employment. Repeals by implication are not favored, and I believe the provisions of the Clayton Act will stand unimpaired and unaffected if the bill shall become law. If I believed that it did repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of the act approved October 15, 1914, I would join with the Senator from New Hampshire in voting against the conference report. Believing, however, that it does not affect the provisions of the act just referred to, I shall vote for the conference report. I do so, however, reluctantly and with serious misgivings. Some of the features of the bill are excellent and will result in some benefits and advantages to the public and to the Nation.

There are features of the bill that are very obnoxious and odious to me, and will, I believe, prove disappointing to the public. Of course it is difficult to bring our minds to a contemplation of the fact that we are at war, and that our industries must be mobilized, and that the process of mobilization means more or less of governmental restraint and control. Nevertheless, I believe the licensing provisions of the bill may prove exceedingly oppressive; indeed, will prove very oppressive and obnoxious if in the administration of the bill there is not the highest wisdom and sagacity employed. In my opinion some Senators will vote for this bill because of their great confidence in the President. His ability and patriotism are warranty for the wise and patriotic execution of the great trust committed to the executive department by this bill. However, there are some provisions that seem subversive of the rights of the States, and their constitutionality will doubtless be challenged. Too much is expected by the public of the bill. In my opinion it will fail to satisfy the consumers, who expect prodigious reforms in our economic situation, and particularly in all matters relating to food and fuel supplies. The era of high prices is upon us, and this bill will fail to bring prices to a proper level and will prove a disappointment to the wage earners and to the consuming public, especially in the great centers of population. Nor will it, in my opinion, be very effective in stimulating agricultural production; but the situation is such that some legislation is required relating to the food problem, and particularly with reference to coal. National legislation relating to these matters, particularly in view of our dual form of Government, necessarily must provoke serious differences of opinion and honest but strong opposition. Governmental control of private enterprises and the fixing of prices by the Federal Government will inevitably provoke discussion and opposition; but the necessities of the Government and the people resulting from the war and the obligations resting upon us to supply our allies with food perhaps demands a radical departure from the industrial conditions obtaining in times of peace.

The food and fuel situation is so acute as to demand some Federal action; the people demand this bill or one giving to the President power to control foods and fuels. The President feels that this legislation is necessary in order to aid in the vigorous prosecution of the war. Considering all these facts, I shall support the conference report, notwithstanding this measure is, as I have stated, very imperfect in my opinion, radical and extreme in many of its provisions, and will prove disappointing and unsatisfactory to the people.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Commitee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE V.

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified within six years from the date of their proposal by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, or by the electors in three-fourths thereof, as the mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

PRINTING OF WAR-REVENUE BILL.

Mr. SIMMONS. I submit the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina submits a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 113), as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of Senate Document No. 74, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, entitled "Revenue to defray War Expenses," of which 10,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 for the use of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the resolution provide for the printing of the revenue bill or the report of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. It provides for the printing of the bill. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that the 15,000 additional copies of the bill heretofore authorized to be printed have been exhausted, and there is still a very great demand for copies of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know the great demand there has been for the printing of 15,000 extra copies of the bill, and I know they should be printed, but I believe that we have already exhausted our right by a Senate resolution under the law to print extra copies of this bill. We have already printed 15,000 copies of it, which comes within a very few dollars of the $500 limit of printing allowed under a Senate resolution.

In looking over the precedents, Mr. President, I find that the spirit if not the exact letter of the law has been violated by the Senate in the past. At the time the Monetary Commission was in existence it was claimed that the law meant that the Senate could order $500 worth of printing on a Senate resolution in the morning of one day and in the afternoon there could be another similar resolution presented and passed, and that as many such resolutions could be passed as it was possible for the Senate to act upon during the day or at any time thereafter. At that time it was decided that that was not a compliance with the law, and that wherever a resolution of the Senate was passed authorizing the printing of a document the printing of which would cost $500, the Senate had taken advantage of the law in the printing of such Senate document to the extent which was permissible.

Mr. President, I also desire to state that this question has been discussed by members of the Printing Committee of the other House and with members of the Printing Committee of the Senate, and it was tacitly agreed that the law should not be violated in the future in this way. I admit that the law provides that not to exceed $500 worth of printing shall be authorized under one resolution, and in the past there have been printed Senate documents under Senate resolutions the cost of which amounted to more than $500.

I call attention now, Mr. President, to the matter, not that I am going to object to the printing of 15,000 extra copies of the revenue bill, for I admit they are needed very badly, but for the reason that I believe the Senate ought in the future to adhere strictly to the policy which was adopted years ago in relation to expending more than $500 in the printing of one document at any time under a Senate resolution. Mr. President, if such a policy is not adopted there is no need of having a law providing a limitation upon the amount of printing that may be ordered under a Senate resolution, for the Senate may print just as many copies of documents as it desires and keep printing them as long as it may see fit.

I merely wanted to emphasize the fact that the spirit of the law and the agreement which was virtually entered into ought to be lived up to in the future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at noon on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session, the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Wednesday, August 8, 1917) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being under the order previously made, until Friday, August 10, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

POSTMASTER.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Pierre H. Fike, Spartanburg.

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate August 8 (legislative day of August 4), 1917.

POSTMASTER.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Florence K. Metcalf, Campobello.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 10, 1917.

Rev. Frank Eakes, of Atlanta, Ga., offered the following prayer:

We are grateful to Thee, our heavenly Father, for the great men Thou hast given to the world—for the great men of this our own land and country. We pray Thy blessing upon every one engaged in the work of forwarding Thy kingdom. Bring to pass such things as may be good for the world and for all humanity. Let Thy blessing rest upon the proceedings here this day, that all things may be done to the honor and glory of Thy name. We ask for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Saturday, August 4, 1917, when, on request of Mr. HARDWICK and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 4188. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products; and

H. R. 4961. An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

PETITIONS.

Mr. HARDWICK presented a petition of sundry citizens of Gordon County, Ga., praying for the observance of the Constitution and asserting their rights thereunder, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MYERS. I present resolutions adopted by the State board of charities of New York, indorsing the Hollis and Myers amendments to the pending revenue bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at stated meeting of State board of charities, held in New York City, July 11, 1917, relative to Hollis-Myers amendments to tax bill.

Whereas there is now under consideration by the Senate Finance Committee an amendment to the tax bill known as the Hollis amendment, which provides that deductions shall be allowed from taxable income for gifts and contributions for charitable, educational, and religious purposes, in the same manner as for the expenses of business, and for taxes paid for the support of national, State, or local governments which are now deductible from gross income in ascertaining the net income upon which the income tax is levied; and

Whereas there is also pending before the same committee the Myers amendment to the same bill, which provides that legacies and bequests for charitable, educational, and religious purposes shall be exempt from the Federal estate tax (inheritance tax); and

Whereas the State Board of Charities of the State of New York, which has under supervision an intimate acquaintance with more than 600 private charitable institutions of the State, representing not only a capital investment of millions of dollars but also the life investment of thousands of persons who have by great care, self-denial, and much effort made these institutions effective in caring for all classes of dependents, is fully convinced that the proposed increased taxation will seriously affect the private charitable institutions of the State by the curtailment of their income unless the proposed exemption is incorporated in the pending legislation: Be it

Resolved, That the State board of charities unanimously indorses the Hollis and the Myers amendments, which will, if adopted, safeguard the work of charitable institutions by such exemption from taxation of gifts and bequests.

Resolved, That the secretary of this board be, and he is hereby, directed to forward to the President of the United States Senate, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and also to the Senators of the State of New York copies of this resolution.

Mr. MYERS presented resolutions adopted by the Montana Bankers' Association, of Great Falls, Mont., favoring the enactment of legislation in order to deal with the I. W. W. organization, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Add a new section, as follows:

SEC —. That section 203 of the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end of subdivision (a) a further paragraph numbered (3), so that section 203 will read as follows:

"SEC 203. That for the purpose of the tax the value of the net estate shall be determined—

"(a) In the case of a resident, by deducting from the value of the gross estate—

"(1) Such amounts for funeral expenses, administration expenses, claims against the estate, unpaid mortgages, losses incurred during the settlement of the estate arising from fires, storms, shipwreck, or other casualty, and from theft, when such losses are not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, support during the settlement of the estate of those dependent upon the decedent, and such other charges against the estate as are allowed by the laws of the jurisdiction, whether within or without the United States, under which the estate is being administered;

"(2) An exemption of $50,000; and

"(3) All bequests, legacies, devices, or gifts to the United States, or to any State, or to any political division thereof, for exclusively public purposes, and all bequests, legacies, devices, or gifts for uses of a religious literary, charitable or educational character, or for the encouragement of art, or to societies for the prevention of cruelty to children or for the prevention of cruelty to animals.

"(b) In the case of a nonresident, by deducting from the value of that part of his gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States that proportion of the deductions specified in paragraph (1) of subdivision (a) of this section which the value of such part bears to the value of his entire gross estate, wherever situated. But no deductions shall be allowed in the case of a nonresident unless the executor includes in the return required to be filed under section 205 the value at the time of his death of that part of the gross estate of the nonresident not situated in the United States."

LEASE OF POTASH LANDS.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have an article here from the New York Times of this morning relative to the bill which has been reported out by the Public Lands Committee concerning potassium and which follows in a somewhat similar line as to the other natural resources of the States. I ask unanimous consent that this editorial from the New York Times be read at the desk by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times.]

A LAKE OF POTASH.

The Senate Committee on Public Lands has reported favorably a bill, introduced by Senator PITTMAN, the passage of which would probably cause a great increase of the quantity of potash produced in this country. Our supply of potash, so useful as a fertilizer, formerly came from Germany. But imports from the extensive deposits there ended with the beginning of the war. While a notable growth of new industries, involving the investment of more than $200,000,000, has given us a large output of dyestuffs and chemicals which in the days of peace were sent from Germany, there has been no domestic compensation for the loss of German potash. The search for mineral deposits here must be called unsuccessful. Small quantities are taken from feldspar and found as by-products in the cement industry. We are also taking potash from kelp or seaweed on the southern Pacific coast, and the Government is about to set up a factory there. Deposits of alunite in Utah have been made to yield something in addition. But all we have been able to produce is very little in comparison with our great imports in the past.

Senator PITTMAN says in a letter to the Council of National Defense that his bill is designed to promote utilization of the potash in Searles Lake, Cal. It is estimated by the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines that the waters of this lake hold in solution not less than 20,000,000 tons of chloride of potash, which can be taken out at a cost which will be low enough to permit the use of it as a fertilizer. The lake and the land surrounding it have been withdrawn by the Government from the operation of the mining laws, and there is no statute under which the productive work can be done. It is provided in the bill that exclusive rights to prospect for potash shall be granted and that patents shall be issued for tracts in which the mineral is found. Holders of patents must pay annual rentals and an output royalty of not less than 2 cents a pound. The Senator points to our imports of 529,000 tons in 1913 and of only 10,000 tons in 1916, while the price has been multiplied by 10. This potash should not remain in the lake. It should be available for use on the farms. As all the safeguards which could be suggested are in the bill, it should be passed without delay.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]? Mrs. James W. Wadsworth, jr.,

president of the Women's Anti-Suffrage Association, issued a letter a short while ago pointing out the impropriety of picketing and certain forms of suffrage. Certain citizens of my community, who I assume from their correspondence are opposed to this course from the communication, desire to have this letter printed in the RECORD. My views on suffrage are nowise involved at this time, but as an accommodation to those who are apparently opposed to suffrage I ask that their request that this letter may be published in the RECORD be granted. If there is no objection, I tender the communication of Mrs. Wadsworth to be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Illinois is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

"In accepting the presidency of the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage Mrs. James W. Wadsworth, jr., of Washington, D. C., wife of the senior Senator from New York and daughter of the late Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State under Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt, issues the following statement:

"'I have just received your note informing me of the action taken by the executive board of the National Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage in moving the national headquarters to Washington and electing me president of the association subsequent to the resignation of Mrs. Dodge, who for so many years has been our faithful and efficient leader. Although most reluctant to shoulder any additional burden outside the care of my family, the war-relief work, and the charities in which I am already engaged, I feel that it is my duty, in the interest of patriotism and national defense, to accept this office and to do my utmost to justify your confidence. I feel deeply the honor and responsibility you have conferred on me by this choice and am profoundly impressed with the importance of our endeavor.

"'Red Cross work and war-relief work are cruel and pressing necessities and should not be slighted for any other consideration; but, God willing, their importance and need will only last for a few years, through the war and period of reconstruction, whereas this question of suffrage is to affect the life and government of our Nation until the very end of our existence.

"'We are a country at war. Surely the qualities of leadership most needed at this time are strength, stability, breadth, and fairness of vision, a direct and uncomplex method of thought and action. Can we possibly hope to gain these by throwing into our national politics so inflammable and uncertain an element as the feminine vote?

"'In spite of the embarrassed protests of thousands of good women suffragists against the seditious and disloyal actions of the pickets in Washington, is it not in every way probable that these bolder and more audacious spirits would lead and influence those of the less responsible voters, both men and women, than could be counteracted by the conservative and well-meaning woman voter, who to get into the political arena herself would have to open the door to so lawless and mischief-making a company?

"'Furthermore, I feel that it is a very poor economy to duplicate instead of to divide labor and responsibility. It is bad "team work," whether in play, in business, or in life itself, for two people to be in a place where one is sufficient. I believe strongly in woman's star of destiny, but I also believe that it shines far above and beyond the field of politics, and with your loyal help and cooperation I propose to do my very best to keep it there.'"

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On August 9, 1917:

S. 1816. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

On August 10, 1917:

S. 2356. An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

RELIEF OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN (S. DOC. NO. 75).

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document certain correspondence between President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo relating to the bill providing for family allowances, indemnification, reeducation, and insurance in behalf of officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEASE OF POTASH LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am informed that the revenue bill will not be taken up until the hour of 2 o'clock. During the last morning hour——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say of course the unfinished business would not come up until 2 o'clock, but I had expected to call it up this morning as soon as the routine business was disposed of. However, since I have come into the Chamber several Senators have urged me very strongly not to interfere with the morning hour for other business. I have said that I would not ask to take up the bill out of its order, but that I would wait until 2 o'clock, when the bill will be laid before the Senate, and I hope we shall then proceed with it continuously until it is disposed of.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under those conditions, and only under those conditions, will I make the motion I intended to make. During the last morning hour we had about completed the consideration of the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium. I feel that the debate is about concluded on that matter and that we can finish it in a very short time. The importance of the bill is known to the Senate without further explanation. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] proposes an amendment on page 3, line 24, after the word "lessee," to insert the words "and the potash public lands in San Bernardino County, Cal., may be operated by the United States."

Mr. SMOOT. As a substitute for that amendment I desire to offer the following amendment: After the word "lessee," in line 24, page 3, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the potash deposits in the public lands in San Bernardino County, in the State of California, may be operated by the United States if the Secretary of the Interior is unable to lease the same upon satisfactory terms.

I offer that amendment with a view of having the amendment of the committee on page 2, line 24, inserting the words "operated by the United States or" disagreed to, and then allow the amendment that I have offered to follow on line 24, page 3.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as the Senator having the bill in charge I have no objection to that amendment for this reason: The report of the Government shows after three years of prospecting for potash the only substantial field that has been discovered which may be immediately used is Searles Lake, in San Bernardino County, Cal.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a second, until I finish. If the Government has the authority to operate those potash deposits, it will then be in a position where it can control the price of the product of every other potash deposit in the United States. That is the real object of this measure. I am trying to avoid opposition, I am trying to pass the bill. So far as I am personally concerned, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah would protect the people of this country just as well as the language placed in the bill by the committee.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. As I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, if the Government can not lease the lands then it may operate them.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the understanding.

Mr. KELLOGG. And the Government has to go through the process of trying to lease the land before it can operate it itself. It seems to me that with this large deposit and with the pressing necessity on the Government the Government ought to have the authority to operate it at once if the Government feels that such is the necessity of the case.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say this, Mr. President. The testimony before the Public Lands Committee demonstrated the fact that it would cost a million dollars for the Government to prepare to operate at Searles Lake, and there are now two great concerns there that have facilities to commence immediate operation. If the Government can execute a satisfactory lease with them, I believe it to the interests of the people of the country. If the Government can not execute a satisfactory lease, then, of course, the Government will have to go to the expense of operating it.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the attention of the Senator from Minnesota. If he will follow the amendment he will see that it is in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. The amendment reads as follows:

Provided, That the potash deposits in the public lands in San Bernardino County, in the State of California, may be operated by the United States, if the Secretary of the Interior is unable to lease the same upon satisfactory terms.

Or, in other words, if the terms imposed by the Secretary of the Interior are not satisfactory, then, of course, he could not lease them, and in such case the Government can operate the potash deposits.

Mr. KELLOGG. That means that the Secretary of the Interior must lease them if he can do so on satisfactory terms.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not see any reason why the Government should not be authorized to operate the mines in San Bernardino County if it is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior or of the Government that it is for the interest of the public to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see that it will be to the interest of the public for the Government to work and operate mines in the United States, especially if the Secretary of the Interior has it in his power to make a lease that is absolutely satisfactory to the Government of the United States. We might just as well have the Government go into the operation of every other class of industry in the United States. But this amendment guards the interests not only of the people but of the Government of the United States as well.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, would the Senator from Utah object to modifying the amendment so as to make it optional with the Secretary of the Interior whether he shall lease it or operate it? I should have no objection to that amendment. I am in accord with the Senator from Minnesota in what he stated. I can see no good reason why the Government should not operate it, if it thought it best, without being compelled to ascertain whether or not it would be leased. If the Senator from Utah will modify his amendment making it optional with the Secretary of the Interior whether or not he shall lease it or operate it, personally I would have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the amendment does that now.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I think the Senator's amendment compels the Secretary of the Interior to lease it. He is to ascertain if it is possible to lease it.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment says "may be operated by the United States if the Secretary of the Interior is unable to lease the same upon satisfactory terms."

Mr. GRONNA. I would construe that to mean that the Secretary of the Interior must first undertake to lease it, and if it can be leased, of course, the Government then could not operate it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, allow me now to read the amendment as it would be following the suggestion of the Senator:

Provided, That the potash deposits in the public lands of San Bernardino County, in the State of California, may be operated by the United States or may be leased by the United States upon satisfactory terms.

Then there would be no question about the alternative.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a pending amendment. The pending amendment is the amendment reported by the committee, which the Secretary will now state.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, line 24, after the words "may be," it is proposed to insert "operated by the United States, or."

Mr. SMOOT. In order that the bill may conform to the amendment which I have just offered, I ask that the committee amendment may be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. I understand that any prospector having a license from the Secretary of the Interior may, if he finds potash on Government land, locate 640 acres. Is that correct?

Mr. PITTMAN. He may get a permit to prospect for potash on 2,560 acres, and if he discovers potash, then the Government rewards him for it by giving him a patent for one-fourth of the land covered by the permit.

Mr. WEEKS. Would that permit him to make an investigation in a Government park?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I think not. It could only be on the public lands of the Government.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me call this fact to the attention of the Senator: The Government has been buying a great many tens of thousands of acres of land in the Appalachian region; there is potash all through that region; it is insoluble now; it is not obtainable under any process known to-day; but a process may be discovered at any time which would enable that potash to be obtained in large quantities. That land has cost the Government from $5 to $10 an acre. Would it be possible for a permittee to locate 2,560 acres of land in that region and to obtain 640 acres of it if he discovers potash there?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, as I understand, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me, the Appalachian region is a reserve; it is not public land in the sense we usually employ that term. It is Government-owned land, but it is part of a reservation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has the floor. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire recognition?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No. I wanted the Senator from Nevada to yield to me for a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to suggest, in addition to what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has said, that it would be advisable, it seems to me, to insert in the bill, after the words "public lands," the words "not heretofore devoted to governmental purposes," or "heretofore appropriated or reserved," or some such phrase as that.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the language at the top of page 2. The words "public lands belonging to the United States" are recommended to be stricken out, and that will leave the language so that any land, whether in a reservation or not, may be entered. The term "public land" has a well-defined meaning in the land laws of the United States. It means land that is open to public entry of some kind.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is true.

Mr. NELSON. It does not refer to reserved lands. By striking out those words it will be left so that one might make such an investigation on a reservation or anywhere else if the land belonged to the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that I have already given notice that as soon as the committee amendments are disposed of I shall offer an amendment on page 2, line 2, to insert the words "on public," so that the language would read "on public lands of the United States."

Mr. NELSON. What has been done with the amendment at the top of page 2?

Mr. SMOOT. It has not yet been acted upon. It will be, however; and I then intend to offer the amendment I have suggested, so that the language will read "on public lands of the United States."

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have already given notice of that amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, what will be the status of the remainder of such land after the permittee shall have obtained the right to locate on 640 acres?

Mr. PITTMAN. Under the terms of the bill, that would then be subject to lease by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WEEKS. Would it be subject to entry?

Mr. PITTMAN. It would not be subject to entry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I of course defer to the better judgment and more complete knowledge of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] on questions of what constitute public lands; but I want to call his attention to the fact that the amendment which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says he is going to propose would not, as it seems to me, quite cover the case. It is a purely technical distinction. The Senator from Minnesota says the phrase "the public lands of the United States" has a definite meaning in law, and I assume it may; but I do not think that it is quite synonymous with the phrase "any public land of the United States." A national park would certainly be public land of the United States, land of the United States devoted to a public purpose.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can not yield to the Senator from Colorado, because the Senator from Nevada has the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not at present, for the reason that we are now considering the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Utah. We have temporarily passed over the amendment which the Senator from Connecticut is now discussing.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The present time may not be opportune for a discussion of that amendment, and I have nothing more to say.

Mr. PITTMAN. I say that we have passed by that temporarily. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah, and I should like to have that disposed of first, and then go back to the other matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment on page 3, line 24, after the word "lessee," to insert the words:

Provided, That the potash deposits in the public lands in San Bernardino County, in the State of California, may be operated by the United States or may be leased by the United States upon satisfactory terms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, so as to complete the amendments which relate to the amendment that has already been adopted, I move to strike out, beginning with the word "or," in line 10, on page 1, the following: "or borates, carbonates, or nitrates of sodium, or borates of calcium, or associated similar salts, on public lands belonging to the United States," and, in line 2, page 2, before the word "lands," to insert "on public."

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Will the Senator agree first to act on that part of his amendment proposing to strike out the words he has read?

Mr. SMOOT. That would be all right, and probably, with the notice I have given to the Senate, that will be best.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there is any objection to striking out those words, as the sodium feature of it is taken care of in another bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am somewhat in the dark in this matter. Will the Senator from Utah explain why he wants the language stricken out? Are not those minerals as necessary as are the minerals which are proposed to be included?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; they are not; and not only that, but the bill itself as reported, if the Senator will notice, provides for potassium only, and the requirements in the bill are particularly adaptable to the potassium situation in this country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that the situation as to sodium is taken care of in another bill. It was never the intention of the committee to have this bill cover sodium. It was only to cover potash, but through some mistake sodium was included.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. The only interest I have in the bill, of course, is to see that the Government is given the privilege of getting these minerals. I take it that now is the time when it is necessary for the Government to have all sorts of minerals. I know the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Colorado are well informed on these questions, while I have not had the time to study them, nor do I understand thoroughly the situation. I want to know from the Senator from Utah, if we pass this bill, giving the Government the privilege of mining potash, if it in any way would cripple it from getting other minerals which of course will also be used in the manufacture of explosives?

Mr. SMOOT. Sodium is not used in the manufacture of such materials.

Mr. GRONNA. What is it used for, then; fertilizers?

Mr. SMOOT. Sodiums are not used for fertilizers.

Mr. GRONNA. Then, what is the idea?

Mr. SMOOT. Sodium salts generally go into the manufacture of different chemicals.

I will say to the Senator that the Committee on Public Lands has already virtually passed upon a leasing bill covering oil and coal and sodium and the other products that have been suggested, and that bill will, no doubt, be brought up for the action of Congress; but the Senator from Nevada and the other members of the committee thought that the question of potash was so acute at this time that it would be easier to get a bill covering potash alone through both Houses of Congress than to pass a measure covering all the other items I have mentioned.

Mr. GRONNA. I realize that that is a very important question. We have had that question before the Committee on Agriculture at various times, and I know we have made quite large appropriations to encourage the industry of growing along the coast a certain kind of weed which contains potash. I also know that the Government is intensely interested in the potash situation. I do not know, however, for what purpose it is being used altogether, but I assume that it is used to some extent in the manufacture of explosives.

Mr. SMOOT. Potash?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, certainly it is used in the manufacture of explosives. I thought the Senator had reference to sodium.

Mr. GRONNA. I had reference to potash.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question that it is absolutely necessary that we produce potash in this country, not only for fertilizing purposes, but for other purposes. That is why I am willing at this time to allow the leasing system to apply under this bill in relation to potassium.

Mr. GRONNA. With that explanation, I have no objection to the measure.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to ask one more question. I have been looking over the report since I came into the Chamber, and I notice that the Secretary of the Interior seems to have indicated in the letter which he wrote to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the bill is similar to a bill which was acted on by the Senate at the last Congress or at the present session of Congress. Did the Interior Department or the General Land Office approve of that bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. It did. The bill passed the House, and came to this body and the potash provision was approved by this body.

Mr. WEEKS. The Secretary indicates the necessity for potash, but he does not state in this particular letter that he approves of this bill in its present form.

Mr. PITTMAN. He has subsequently reported favorably on this bill with the amendments suggested.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret to find myself in the minority with respect to this important bill. I am assured that it will pass, and am told by members of the committee that it is deemed to be of such importance at this time as to be regarded as a war measure and to warrant the support of all Senators. Notwithstanding the appeals made for its support, I can not bring myself to indorse the views of its advocates, and shall therefore vote against its passage. If it were not for my great respect for the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and my high regard for the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], both of whom assure me that it will not materially affect the principles and policies underlying our mineral system, I should feel compelled to do everything within my power to defeat it. As it is, I shall content myself with a brief statement of my views, and then vote in the negative. The bill, on its face, is not so obnoxious as might be thought from the terms of opposition which I have heretofore employed against it. But the policy of this legislation and the principles involved therein, in my opinion, are fraught with great danger to the accepted policy of our Government with respect to the mineral lands owned by the United States. This legislation I regard as inexpedient, unwise, and as being a departure from established methods and policies of the Government and will prove harmful to the country and injurious and oppressive to the West. What is desired is the occupation, settlement, and development of the public lands and the exploitation of the mineral resources of our country. Whatever will conduce to the development of these lands is best for the Nation, as well as for the States in which the lands are found. It is inexpedient to interpose obstacles to the acquisition of title by private individuals to the mineral lands of our country. I do not mean, of course, that a monopoly of the mineral lands should be encouraged or desired; but the policy of our Government has been to encourage private persons to enter upon the public domain and upon the mineral lands, and by the expenditure of time and means bring forth the mineral wealth locked up therein. Experience has demonstrated that this liberal policy is the most effective method of developing the mineral resources of our country.

The adventurous sons of the East, attracted by the discovery of gold in California, hastened across the desert wastes, and by other routes, and located the lands containing rich minerals. It is a matter of common knowledge that the system established by them became the basis of the legislation enacted by Congress a number of years thereafter. When the Federal Government came to legislate with respect to its mineral possessions, it adopted rules and regulations established by the miners of the West, and, in the main, crystallized them into law. A system of leasing and landlordism would not have poured into the arteries and channels of trade the hundreds of millions that came to our Nation under the wise and beneficent policy adopted by our national lawgivers.

The element of hazard and chance is so great in mining that the leasing system will not encourage development, but, on the contrary, will retard and discourage development. The knowledge that title could be obtained with ease and that the possession of the occupant would be protected was an inducement to thousands of prospectors and miners to thread the mountain fastnesses and desert wastes and to search out the hidden treasures therein and pour them into the lap of commerce. These men would not have undergone the hazards and hardships and incurred the risks and dangers that they had to encounter if a bureaucratic and paternal system had obtained.

I desire to state that this bill contains an element of paternalism that is obnoxious to me. It permits leasing by the Federal Government. In my opinion, it is unwise and will prove to be inefficient. The Federal Government will be unsuccessful as a landlord and in operating mines. If I had the time, I could show that other nations, as well as our own, have attempted to develop mines under leasing systems, but the attempts were usually attended with failure. For a number of years in the early days of this Republic the law provided for leasing lead, saline, and other mineral lands. Great complaint was made against the law and the operation of the Government thereunder. The system under these enactments became the subject of investigation and of discussion in the Congress of the United States. There were strong and able debates over the policy of the Government in dealing with these lands and over the suggestion of continuing and extending landlordism with respect to any part of the public domain. Finally the sentiment became so strong against the system that it was swept from the statute books. The records conclusively show that under the leasing system mineral lands were not developed; they brought no revenue to the Government, and the policy was attended by friction, irritation, and general discontent. President Polk recommended the repeal of the laws, and his recommendations were carried into effect.

I believe that the people now desire that the mineral wealth within the public domain should be placed at their disposal. The thought of all patriotic men, and those who have controlled the legislation of our Nation as well as those who have desired proper conservation of the resources of our country, has been to unlock the mineral wealth of the Nation. But there is some difference as to the method to be employed. We want the gold, silver, copper, lead, and other minerals of our country taken from mother earth and placed at the disposal of the people. We want gold and silver to add to our circulating medium and to augment the general prosperity not only of our country but the world. We need the lead, copper, zinc, coal, iron, oil, and other minerals in our country in our industries and in the business enterprises of our Nation, and in this crisis in the life of our country they are indispensable. Whatever will obstruct the development of the mineral lands of our country and tend to keep locked within the rocky fastnesses of our country those important metals is injurious to all classes and to the country. It is a narrow and mistaken view that seeks to limit the production of mineral wealth or interpose obstacles to the freest development of the mineral lands. The wealth dug out of the ground goes to the people. The miner who discovers and develops a paying mine can not, if he prospers, conceal it; his success means the opening of the mine and the putting of the product on the market. This means increased labor, higher wages, and the general enrichment of all.

I believe that this bill, if enacted into law, will operate as a bad and dangerous precedent. It will be regarded as the introduction of a wedge aimed at the destruction of the present laws which deal with the mineral lands of the Nation and will be interpreted as meaning that the Government intends to adhere to the policy followed for a number of years, under which hundreds of millions of acres of public domain, mineral and agricultural, will remain locked and sealed—a "promised land," denied to the present generation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield to my friend from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to state to the Senator that I heartily agree with what he says with regard to the evils of a leasing system, and I have expressed my views in the Senate time and time again with relation to that subject, as has also the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]; but we have met with a constant opposition by reason of the fact that many believe that a leasing system should exist. This is a compromise bill. It allows a permit to be issued for 2,560 acres of potash land, and if a man makes a discovery, then he is entitled to one-fourth of that in fee simple. So that it is a compromise between the leasing system and the entry system; and, inasmuch as these lands have been locked up for probably 10 or 15 years and it is necessary that they should be developed, we have thought best to accept this compromise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate the reasons which induced my colleague, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and other western Senators to assent to this measure. I have no doubt that they have found that there is pronounced opposition to a restoration of these "locked lands" by private entry, as well as objection to the perpetuation of the mineral-land system which for so many years has obtained in this Republic; and doubtless they have found a desire upon the part of some to withdraw mineral lands from entry and deal with them through a leasing system or some form of governmental control; but I reiterate, Mr. President, that, in my opinion, this bill will establish a bad precedent; one that will be seized upon by agents and agencies of the Government and by others hostile to a true, just, and beneficent policy of development, and will be made the basis of persistent demands for subjecting all the mineral lands of the United States to a deadening paternalism and to a governmental control that is odious and obnoxious to every American.

I do not like bureaucracy; I do not believe in the paternalism that seems to have reared its head in some of the departments of the Government. This bill, in my judgment, is fundamentally wrong and will be a precedent that will come home to plague my distinguished friend from Colorado and the western Senators, and will be used as a weapon for the repeal of existing mineral laws.

My friend says that the lands have been locked up. I grant it; that is one of the grounds of my complaint; but because the lands have been locked up and the public have been denied entry thereon, and the development of the public domain pro tanto has been retarded, that does not justify legislation of this character, so utterly at variance with the past legislation of the United States—at least, the legislation that has prevailed since the year 1866.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to state to the Senator also that, in my judgment, the leasing system will prove a failure, and the quicker it proves a failure the easier it will be for us to get legislation such as the Senator desires. Congress passed three years ago a leasing bill as to coal lands up in Alaska. I made the prediction that they would not make a single lease up there, and not a single lease has been made, although three years of time have elapsed since then. People will not enter into leases with the Government when they are subject to forfeiture. Therefore, if we give them this proposition to demonstrate their theory, and it is shown by experience that it will not operate, it will resolve itself back to the very position for which the Senator contends and which I think is the wise governmental policy.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me in that same connection, the Government also, in the paternalism of which you complain, and with your complaint I have great sympathy, have reserved in the States, under claim of title to the land, water-power sites—an absolute intrusion on the right of every State—and they have reserved these water-power sites, with the vast lands about them, for the purposes of leasing. They will be under that reservation when Gabriel blows his horn, as far as any development of water-power is concerned. So if it were not for the fact in this bill that a man can discover land and get his individual title, I would not myself for one minute consent to any leasing system.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the illustration to which my friend, the Senator from Arizona, refers confirms, in my opinion, the views I have imperfectly suggested. There is no sufficient reason why these lands should have been withdrawn from entry. There is no reason why the enterprising people who desired to go upon the public lands should have been denied full opportunity to do so, and to bring forth the hidden riches that may be found there. Men will not lease from the Government the mineral lands; and I agree with the Senator from Colorado that the leasing system will be a failure whenever adopted in this country, as it has been a failure here in the past.

A year or two ago a plan was evolved looking to the leasing by the Government of some of the carbonate mineral lands of the Government, and to the operation by the Government of a portion of the lands containing the same class of minerals. The plan also contemplated the building of mills to treat and handle the ores. In other words, the idea was that the Government should enter upon the public domain, prospect for minerals, mine the same, and erect the necessary plants for treating the ores, and should then dispose of the same to the public—that is, the Government was to enter the field of private enterprise and to engage in the hazardous business of mining. The scheme was so unwise that it was foredoomed to failure. Fortunately the bill did not pass, and I believe the plan has been abandoned. Of course, it must be obvious that the Government of the United States ought not to engage in mining activity or go upon public domain and prospect, develop, and work mines and mining properties. Private enterprise can accomplish these results far more successfully. Government enterprises of this kind would develop a paternalism that would be obnoxious and oppressive. Mr. President, a wrong was done in locking up such vast areas of the mineral lands of our country. There is no justification, in my opinion, for continuing this policy. If we want potash lands developed, or other mineral lands, throw them open to public entry. Tell the people that they can go upon them and under reasonable rules and regulations obtain title thereto. There is too much of bureaucracy in certain departments of our Government. There is a disposition to have too many boards and bureaus; too many commissions and subcommissions, inspectors, Government employees, and Federal agencies. The people of the West have suffered from the indefensible activities of Government subordinates and agencies. Men have been hampered in obtaining titles not only to mineral but to agricultural lands. There has been too much supervision, a resort to too many technicalities, and a disposition to prevent individuals from developing lands and obtaining title thereto. Men have been sent to inspect lands who were not in sympathy with the law and are not in sympathy with the policy of the Government permitting alienation of any of its lands; they have regarded men seeking to obtain titles as enemies to the country if not positive thieves and criminals; and with this unsympatheitc view they have made the acquisition of title difficult and, in many instances, impossible. As a result, there has not been the development of the mineral lands and of the waterpower and agricultural lands that otherwise would have resulted.

I repeat that the mineral lands ought to be opened up to the public. Unlock the door to opportunity, and the courageous and vigorous men and women of our country will take the risks and hazards incident to entry upon these lands and to their development, and will add to the prosperity and wealth of our Nation.

But, in my opinion, the day has come when the public lands within the States should be ceded to the States. The States can control them far better than the Federal Government can, and their administration will result in benefits to the people and to the Nation never realized under Federal supervision.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may be permitted in the Senator's time, I should like to say that I am somewhat surprised at the statement of the Senator from Utah. If I understood him correctly, he said that he did not know why these lands had been withdrawn from entry. The Senator knows that only a very few years ago the most tremendous campaign was made against Mr. Ballinger when he was Secretary of the Interior, and we all know what the charges were, and they were made by the Senator's party. There was an organized effort to see that these charges were brought before the public. Now, does the Senator think that the conditions have changed simply because Mr. Ballinger is not in office, but some other man?—and he is a very good man. Does he think that the people of the country have changed their minds with regard to this important question?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not be diverted from the thoughts that I am briefly submitting by the interrogation of the Senator from North Dakota and the personal element which he has sought to introduce into this matter. I am familiar with what has been denominated the Ballinger controversy and the campaign, as the Senator calls it, or propaganda, that led to the investigation when Mr. Ballinger was Secretary of the Interior. I shall only reiterate now what I said before—that, in my opinion, the plan of withdrawing the mineral lands of the United States, whether they be potash lands or lands that yield the precious metals, or any form of mineral wealth, is unwise; that if development and mineral production is what is desired, it can and will be accomplished by removing the present oppressive restrictions, rescinding the orders of withdrawal, and opening wide the door, so that any person desiring to enter thereon may do so, and make such investigation and such development as his capital and his means and his enterprise will permit. However, as before stated, I think the best way of dealing with the public domain is to cede it to the States. I repeat that the States can handle the public lands far better, with greater economies and with infinitely better results, than they can be handled by the Federal Government and its agencies in Washington. This bureaucratic method of handling the public domain has been expensive and extravagant; it has not been profitable to the Government and is not now satisfactory to the people within the States where the public lands are found.

I shall vote against this bill, Mr. President. I shall not occupy any further time or discuss its imperfections, nor will I attempt to obstruct its passage. I am assured from observation and investigation that it will pass. I predict that it will not result in success or accomplish what is designed by its proponents; and I again repeat that it will be a precedent that will come home to vex the people of the West and will be used as the basis for demanding further concessions with respect to the mineral lands and to the repeal of the present mineral system.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment of the Senator from Utah stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah and accepted by the Senator in charge of the bill. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the proposed amendment of the committee at the top of page 2 Mr. SMOOT proposes the following: Beginning on page 1, line 10, after the word "potassium," strike out the comma and the words "or borates, carbonates, or nitrates of sodium, or borates of calcium, or associated similar salts on public lands belonging to the United States," and insert:

on public lands of the United States not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment, after the words "United States," but I ask that the Senate act first upon the amendment which has just been stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, on page 2, line 2, beginning with the word "not," I move to strike out the words "not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described," and insert, after the words "United States," the words "except lands in San Bernardino County, Cal.," so as to conform to the other part of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 2, beginning on line 22, I move to strike out the following words:

and all other lands known to contain such valuable deposits as are enumerated in section 1 hereof.

That is also to conform to the rest of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to strike out the words:

and all other lands known to contain such valuable deposits as are enumerated in section 1 hereof.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to know how the sentence will read after that amendment is made.

The SECRETARY. So that, if amended, it will read:

All other lands described and embraced in such a prospecting permit from and after the exercise of the right to patent accorded to the discoverer, and not covered by leases, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, on page 4, line 1, after the word "of," I move to insert the word "such," so that it will read:

That in addition to areas of such mineral land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 1, before the words "mineral land," it is proposed to insert the word "such."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, on page 6, line 20, I move to strike out the words "or sodium," so as to conform with the title of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 20, after the word "potassium," it is proposed to strike out the words "or sodium."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, is this an amendment to a committee amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. No.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think we had better get through the committee amendments first.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I beg pardon. I thought they had been completed.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a committee amendment on page 6, line 20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 20, the committee proposes to strike out the words "phosphate, oil, gas."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 7, line 18, after the word "initiated," the committee proposes to insert a colon and the words:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent any State or Territory wherein the lands or deposits leased are located from levying and collecting taxes on improvements upon or the output or product from any lands or minerals leased under this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 7, the committee proposes a new section, as follows:

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to incorporate in every lease issued under the provisions of this act a provision reserving to the President the right to regulate the price of minerals extracted and sold from the leased premises, which stipulation shall specifically provide that the price or prices fixed shall be such as to yield a fair and reasonable return to the lessee upon his investment and to secure to the consumer the product at the lowest price reasonable and consistent with the foregoing: Provided, That such lease issued under this act shall also stipulate that during the present war or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged, the President shall have authority to so regulate the disposal of the minerals produced under such lease as to secure their distribution and use wholly within the limits of the United States or its possessions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to an amendment that I think ought to be made to the committee amendment on page 8, line 1, in which there is reserved to the President the right to regulate the price of minerals extracted and sold. I am going to ask the Senator if he does not think that now that sodium is stricken out it ought to reserve to the President the right to regulate "the price of such mineral extracted"?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I think that should be definite.

Mr. SMOOT. After the word "of," then, I move to insert "such," and to make the plural singular, on page 8, line 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 1, after the word "of," before the word "mineral," it is proposed to insert the word "such"; also to strike out the "s," so that the word "minerals" will be singular.

Mr. SMOOT. And the same thing in line 10 of the same page, after the words "disposal of."

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to strike out the word "the," before the word "minerals," on line 10, and to insert the word "such"; also to strike out the word "minerals" and insert "mineral."

Mr. SMOOT. And the word "their," on line 11, before "distribution," should be "its."

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to strike out the word "their," before the word "distribution," and to insert the word "its."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These amendments to the amendment, the Chair understands, are accepted by the Senator from Nevada. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, to be known as section 13, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "640 acres of the land" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "an acreage equal to one-fourth of the lands upon which the deposit is discovered on the land."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the object and purpose of this bill. I do not believe we can engage in any better work than endeavoring to stimulate the discovery in this country of greater amounts of potash, which is, as we all know, a very important ingredient in the manufacture of fertilizers. I do not believe, however, that we should permit the terms of this bill to be such as to give the prospector an opportunity to procure a patent to the entire amount of the land upon which he makes the discovery.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would not that be accomplished by striking out the words "640 acres" and inserting "one-fourth of the land embraced in the permit"?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not think it would, Mr. President; because the term "land embraced" there refers not to the land upon which the discovery is made, but to the land included within the prospecting permit. Therefore it would entitle him to one-fourth of the entire acreage of 2,560 acres.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator believe that if a man makes a discovery on the land embraced in his permit he should be permitted to select one-fourth of it?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I hardly agree with that idea. What I am attempting to have provided in this law is that he shall receive one-fourth of the land upon which he makes the discovery and not one-fourth upon which the discovery is made, or 640 acres out of 2,560 acres.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that that would make a complication, that it would be very difficult, indeed, to ascertain the boundary of the potassium lands discovered? The prospector would have to drill or sink a shaft over every few feet of ground and ascertain how much of the area of the land contains the deposit. That would be too costly for him to consider taking out a permit. It seems to me that if we limit his right of patent to one-fourth of the amount embraced in the permit that is definite and distinct, but if the prospector is going to have to sink a shaft or drill on every few feet of the entire 2,560 acres it would be so expensive that nobody would undertake even prospecting.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That might be more definite and distinct, but it affords an opportunity for the prospector to get the cream of the tract and the Government would have nothing left upon which you would find a deposit. It would also have a tendency to lessen the energies and efforts of the prospector to see whether a deposit exists upon the entire tract. If he goes in on 2,560 acres and discovers 640 acres upon which a deposit may exist, then as far as he is concerned he would no doubt under this measure cease his labor, and there would be no advantage in any investigation upon the remainder of the tract upon which his permit authorized prospecting.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator will understand that this matter was recognized as having merits at the time the so-called oil-lease bill was first brought before the Senate some four years ago. Since that time I believe three separate bills have been before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate and the Public Lands Committee of the House, and they realized the difficulty of such a limitation as the Senator proposes. So they decided in connection with oil that they would give the prospector a permit upon 2,560 acres, or such amount as was open, and reward the discoverer with one-fourth. They did also the same thing with potash. They pursued that same course during four years' time. The bill passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously with the very provision this bill now contains with regard to potash. I think it is too late for us to attempt to work out anything definitely at this time. I do not think we could accomplish it. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Colorado of one-fourth instead of 640 acres is practical, because there might not be 2,560 acres in the permit. In a few minutes I am going to offer an amendment to cover that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I previously stated, my idea was to give the Government the advantage of the services of the prospector not merely on the acreage up to the amount he will procure patented but on the entire tract of land. I take the position that if the discovery is on a particular 640 acres, and the prospector finds he will reach 640 acres, then his labors have ended and the Government has not had the benefit of his prospecting the entire tract of land.

I offer the amendment because I think an ample reward would be one-fourth of the land upon which the deposits were actually discovered. If the tract of land contains 2,560 acres and his deposit only covers 460 acres or 450 acres, the natural thing for him to do would be to select that 450 acres and get his patent to it, and the Government would have had no benefit whatever from his endeavors to make the discovery except the matter of having the potash brought upon the market by a private individual, a corporation, or association that would receive a patent free of charge from the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I believe it would be better to restrict it to one-fourth of the area upon which the discovery is made. Then certainly the Government, representing, as it does, the whole American people, would have reserved for the benefit of the entire American people three-fourths of the land upon which the discovery is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would it be in order to amend the committee amendment in section 13?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has already been agreed to. The Senator may move to amend it in the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. I give notice of an amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or the Senator can move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not care to do that.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I move to strike out, on page 8, lines 8 and 9, the words "during the present war or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is offering an amendment to an amendment already agreed to. He will have to move to reconsider before his amendment is in order, or obtain unanimous consent.

Mr. HUSTING. I will ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator was absent when we considered that amendment. I will join with him in the request for unanimous consent if he wants to have it reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMOOT. What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to amend was adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. In what part of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 13.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the vote by which section 13 was agreed to is reconsidered. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, lines 8 and 9, in the committee amendment, strike out the words "during the present war or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on that. I propose to so amend the proviso as to read:

Provided, That such lease issued under this act shall also stipulate that the President shall have authority to so regulate the disposal of the minerals produced under such lease as to secure their distribution and use wholly within the limits of the United States or its possessions.

I do not know of any good reason why that should be confined only to the war period. The bill, as I understand it, will relate primarily to Searles Lake, which is the only known potash deposit of any consequence in the United States or the only deposit easily available. It was stated before the committee, I believe, that other countries have been busying themselves to obtain potash deposits. This being the only deposit in the United States of any consequence, it seems to me that this Government should have the authority, if it desires to exercise it, to confine the sale of that potash to the United States. If we turn this monopoly, and that is what it is, into the hands of private corporations, without necessary restrictions, we shall have no means of using and confining the use of this potash deposit to the United States. I think a number of Senators on the committee doubted the advisability of letting it go at all, in so much as it is a monopoly, but if we are going to permit the Secretary of the Interior to lease it, then we certainly ought to keep control of it.

There is a provision in here that the Government shall reserve the right to fix the price. Of course, if we can only fix that price within the United States that provision would be of little value if the producers of this deposit were at liberty to sell it outside of the United States. That clause would be meaningless. It would be of no value whatever to the people of the United States.

It seems to me that there can be no good reason why the Government should not reserve to itself the right to insist that this potash shall be held in the United States and shall be sold to the people of the United States at a fair price. It is admitted that it is very desirable to have this right reserved to the Government during the war. I think it is as important to have it at any time. This does not mean that the President or the Government shall insist that this potash shall be sold in the United States, but if it is necessary, if it is thought wise, we should have the right to insist that it be sold within the confines of the United States and used within the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HUSTING. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the reason why the committee placed in the words "during the war" was because if there were so many restrictions being placed in the lease it might be difficult to get a lease. I think the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin would justify this body in carrying the amendment, and as far as I am personally concerned, speaking for myself, I am willing to vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that is done I desire to call attention to what I think will be the effect of adopting the amendment. We all admit that we want to encourage the prospecting for potash in every part of the United States. We want also to restrict as far as possible the holdings of the prospector. We give a patent after the discovery is made to a portion of the land on which the permit was issued to the individual discovering the potash. The balance of the land can be leased by the Government of the United States to any citizen of the United States. There is no doubt it will be leased.

I believe that if we strike out the words that any lease issued under this act shall also stipulate that the President shall have authority to so regulate the disposal of the minerals produced under the lease we will find out that the prospectors will not spend their money to prospect for potash, knowing in advance that even if they discover it, and even if they are given one-quarter of the land in which they are given a permit to prospect upon and develop potash, the price of it is virtually left to the President of the United States, and the prospector is not going to take any such chances.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, Senator. My opinion is that if we adopt that amendment and leave it entirely with the President at all times hereafter to regulate the price, the further prospecting for potash in this country will be limited indeed.

I wish to say to the Senator just another word. I have not the least doubt but that within the State of Utah there will be hundreds of thousands of tons of potash produced from lands that are now known to contain potash, discovered a very short time ago. I know of a number of cement plants in the West that are now putting in machinery for the purpose of extracting the potash that is found in the cinders, that are ultimately ground up, from which cement is made. I have seen a statement from one company in which it is claimed tests have been made and found to contain 1 per cent, and in many cases more, of potash, and the company has already ordered the machinery and is going to put it in operation in connection with the cement plant, and is going to produce thousands and thousands of tons of potash from that source.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist upon his amendment, because if it is adopted I feel quite sure the prospecting will be retarded and will be limited to almost nothing in the future.

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. This provision does not apply to any lands that the prospector would obtain under the bill. It applies solely to land that may be leased, because the provision must be contained in the lease.

Another reason why it would not interfere with leasing is that Germany contains a deposit of potash that is estimated to be sufficient to supply the civilized world for 500 years. It is of a character and so situated that none of our experts contend that we can enter into competition with Germany anywhere, unless it be right in the United States. We have no hope of ever being able to ship any potash out of the United States in competition with Germany. Our main hope, our main object, is to be able to supply our own people with potash at a rate that will permit them to use it in the fertilization of their land.

I have not made any argument on this bill, because I think it is more important that it should pass than that we should make speeches. I realize the interest of the Senator from Utah in the matter, and if it applied to the land of the prospector I would not have said what I did say about voting for it, but I read it and it applied only to leases made. Now that we have gotten through with all the amendments in the bill, we will try to pass it before 2 o'clock.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator spoke of the deposit which is well known and which the Government has thought somewhat of trying to operate, namely, the Searles Lake deposit. Would it not be satisfactory to the Senator if we would make the section apply to the public potassium lands of the United States in San Bernardino County, Cal., where Searles Lake is situate? It seems to me that that is the only thing that we have been seriously considering, and that is all the committee thought they were legislating with relation to in this measure.

Then the argument which the Senator from Utah has made would not apply, because if we are going to cripple the prospector so that he can not go out and find land out of which he can get his reward and out of which there can be development, you can readily see that he will not undertake it.

The argument of the Senator from Utah is unanswerable, it seems to me, if the provision is going to apply to all potash lands; but if it is limited to potash lands in San Bernardino County, Cal., so far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to vote for it.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I can not agree with the Senator from Colorado. While this bill refers particularly to Searles Lake, I can not see why the Government should put itself now in a position where deposits of a substance that is limited and which we are obliged to import shall be mined under the laws of the United States, that the people of the United States be deprived of the use of it.

So far as I am concerned, I would not have stood for this provision in the bill at all, so far as permitting the commodity to get into the hands of private parties or of there being a possibility of its getting into the hands of private parties, were it not for the fact that certain people discovered the deposit and undertook to develop Searles Lake and have expended a great deal of money in developing it, and because we are in great need of potash and we need the immediate development of our potash resources either by private or public agencies, and under this bill the Senate can determine which is best for us. I can not, however, understand the soundness of the policy which would move the Government of the United States voluntarily to let slip out of its hands something that is so vital for its interest and welfare and to the productivity of the lands of this country. Here it is now, and we are proposing to pass a law to let it get out of our hands or at least proposing to give the Secretary of the Interior an option to let it get out of our hands. We ought not to do that at all; we ought to keep it and develop it ourselves and then dispose of it as we see fit. I can not think of any good, sound argument why potash lands that are going to be developed under lease under this bill should not be taken subject to the power of the United States to avail itself of this product if, in the judgment of the President of the United States, we need it. We are now importing potash; it is hard to get. We are hard up for potash now, and yet it is argued that while we are still in a position to control it we should let it get out of our hands and let those who take it dispose of it as they see fit.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator answer this question: Would he, in leasing land, stipulate with the Government that the price of his product could be fixed by some one else, and would he not decline to enter into a lease upon such terms?

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator from Colorado, in the first place, that if these people do not want to take the land under these conditions the United States Government itself can produce the potash.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but it never will, as it never has.

Mr. HUSTING. I will ask the Senator if he were the owner of Searles Lake would he lease it except upon terms that would safeguard his interests?

Mr. SHAFROTH. So far as Searles Lake is concerned, I am perfectly willing that this clause shall be inserted, but it seems to me to apply it as to every piece of land that is proposed to be leased under this bill would simply mean that no development would follow. It will be putting in a provision which will absolutely prevent development if we say that this product shall be sold at a price to be named by somebody who has no interest in the leasehold.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I can not look at this matter solely from the standpoint of the prospector or the man who wants to get the best deal out of the Government that he can. I am trying to look at it from the standpoint of the United States. The Government has a right to be considered in this matter; the people of the United States have a right to be considered in it; and laws should be passed not to suit the man who wants favors from the United States, but they ought to be so framed as to conserve the interests of the people of the United States. That is solely the standpoint from which I am looking at the matter. If, in the judgment or the wisdom of the President of the United States, in instances where men take leases from the Government it is not necessary to confine the potash to the United States, well and good; it will not be kept here; but what good will it do to limit the price of potash in the United States when there is perfect liberty to ship it out of the United States and get what its producers can for it? If the Government fixes a price for the product here within the boundaries of the United States and the market price outside of the United States is higher, the result will be that we shall get none of it, because they will seek the market where they can get the greatest price for their product, and we will have no means to avail ourselves of its use or compel its sale here. So this provision as it now stands in the bill really nullifies the practical effect of the power to fix a price which the Government has under the bill. The Government can not fix the price for the outside world; we are not interested in what the outside world is going to pay for this product; but if this language is left in the bill, we might just as well wipe the other provision out, because if the market price outside the United States is higher than in the United States, what will it avail us to fix prices in the United States when the producers of this product will sell none here?

I do not think this bill ought to pass. I shall oppose it as much as I can, to the extent of my ability, if this language remains in the bill, because it is clearly against the interests of the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that this amendment ought to be made. It has been stated to the committee that Searles Lake has a very large deposit of potassium and that there are no other known deposits. The chairman of the committee has just stated that he doubts if any other deposits will be discovered, at any rate in the near future.

It has also been stated to the committee that it is of the most vital importance for this Government and for the people of this country to develop the production of potash for use in war and for fertilizer during the war and afterwards. We all know what tremendous benefits Germany has reaped because, as a Government, she controls the greatest known potash supply. Before the war broke out not only did the German Government lay its hands upon the potash supply of Germany, but it canceled every contract with every American purchaser of potash and forced the people of this country to go to Germany and to pay what Germany fixed as the price for potash. Our purchasers in this country who had, or supposed they had, contracts with Germany had to go to Germany and do what the German Government said.

I do not wish in any way to deter American enterprise by having the Government generally lay its hands upon the production of minerals, fix the prices of products, and to take over the business; that is not what I believe in; but as to the potash supply, which is of importance to the people of this country, it does seem that the Government should have a right to control its disposition and to regulate its price. Certainly the provision which has been agreed to as offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for the Government to regulate the price will deter production as much as to regulate the disposition. It is a well-known fact that our phosphates have been going out of this country by the hundreds of thousands of tons to enrich foreign soil. I think this Government ought to take such steps as will enable it to control all of the potash and fertilizer material there is in this country and to say, if it becomes necessary, that it shall be used in this country alone; at least, that this country should have the preference.

Mr. President, I do not wish to deter development or to impose such restrictions as unduly to stop American enterprise; but we know the benefit this country will reap if it can control the products necessary to war and necessary to the fertilization of its soil. The time is coming in the near future, if it is not here to-day, when the American people must wake up to the fact that we have got to increase the production of our soil and improve our farming methods. So we have got to look to the fertilizer material in this country and be able to control it.

I believe, as I stated before the committee, that this is but a reasonable precaution to insure a control of this great fertilizer ingredient. I think it was only a short time ago that the Congress had under consideration a bill to control certain things, and it was claimed that it was unconstitutional. It certainly is not unconstitutional to so provide as to this commodity in the very bill for the lease of the product. I think the chairman of the committee is right in accepting this amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, on page 8, line 8, after the word "that," it is proposed to strike out "during the present war or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged."

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I also ask that the committee amendments be taken up for action as they are reached.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. I understand that that is to be the rule after we proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Surely; that is done pro forma, to make that the order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for about three hours,

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rose to make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, who has been speaking in a very illuminating way for over three hours. I do not suppose that he can conclude to-day. Would it not be better that we should adjourn and he continue on Monday? I have one reason for making the inquiry. I think it is important to have the Senator's statement in to-morrow's RECORD. A delay of several days has been the subject of a good deal of criticism when practiced on the other side of the Capitol. It will take the Senator some time to correct his very illuminating and important statements so as to have his speech in the RECORD in the morning.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not do it. That is out of the question.

Mr. SMOOT. It is physically impossible.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is physically impossible for me to do it.

Mr. PENROSE. I only thought that it would be impossible if the Senator kept on for an hour longer.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would not undertake to have it ready for to-morrow's RECORD, but I shall try to get it in Sunday's RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. It ought to be in the RECORD as early as possible for the information of Senators who have been unable to be present. Sometimes there has been very undue delay in getting such important statements into the RECORD. I am not criticizing the delay, for I know how difficult it is to get the speech in shape and have the figures accurately given, but I think the Senator having spoken so long he would be willing to have an adjournment until Monday.

Mr. MARTIN. I hope the Senate will not adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. PENROSE. That has been suggested.

Mr. MARTIN. I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate to lose to-morrow when there is such a demand for the completion of vital legislation. I shall move an adjournment until to-morrow when the time comes.

Mr. PENROSE. The suggestion of an adjournment over until Monday did not mean a vacation; it meant to give Senators an opportunity to read the bill and read the report and prepare their own speeches. That was the reason why I urged it at all.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the Senator from North Carolina wish to discontinue his remarks now?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that. Of course, I am a little weary.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator will suit his pleasure. The Senate will conform to his wishes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think I could get through in an hour, and I think by that time both the Senate and myself would be worn out.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator would rather wait until to-morrow to complete his remarks?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would as lief do so.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 11, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 10, 1917.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I am deeply pleased to have a copy of senate resolution 9 in behalf of the nation-wide prohibition amendment which recently passed the United States Senate, and I thank you for transmitting it.

Please convey to the senate my unqualified appreciation of this action. I am especially proud of the fact that my home State, Texas, has been the first State to indorse through both houses of its legislature this resolution after its passage through the United States Senate.

With every good wish, I am,
Yours, very sincerely, MORRIS SHEPPARD.

Hon. JOHN D. MCCALL,
Secretary State Senate, Austin, Tex.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I present a communication received from the Connecticut State Council of Defense, in which is contained a copy of a letter written by the chairman of that council to Provost Marshal Gen. Crowder. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, because it relates to the question of amending the draft act so as to include citizens of our allies and is germane to the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which I hope will be called up at a very early day. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD. I will not delay the Senate to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONNECTICUT STATE COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
Hartford, Conn., August 4, 1917.

The Hon. FRANK B. BRANDGEE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Herewith please find copy of a letter addressed to Provost Marshal Gen. E. H. Crowder. Copies of this letter have been sent to the Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, to the Hon. W. S. Gifford, director of the Council of National Defense, and to every other member of the Connecticut delegation in Congress.

In a recent letter addressed to a member of our council by Provost Marshal Gen. Crowder, the following paragraphs appear:

"I have tried to impress upon others the view that it would be best to accept the Government's apportionment in regulations and estimates already issued, and let the work of the exemption boards go on. If Congress wishes to change the rule of apportionment or if the Director of the Census chooses to revise his estimates, we will call into the service fewer men than we have examined in some overestimated districts. We will call out additional men in other districts for examination and will respond in every State with the net quotas called for by any new rule of apportionment that may be prescribed by Congress or those which correspond with a revised estimate which the Director of the Census may put forth.

"The net quotas which correspond with subdivisions within a State or of the State itself will, following this plan, depend upon Congress or the Director of the Census. Failure upon the part of either to act will leave the net quotas as they have already been fixed."

These statements would indicate, if Gen. Crowder is well advised, that it will be possible to secure relief for Connecticut even as regards the first levy under the draft act. In any event, they clearly point the way to a rectification of the absurd and unfair existing system and possibly make congressional action unnecessary. We realize that to secure any change in the rule of apportionment through congressional action would consume a great deal of time and possibly lead to other complications which we can not now foresee. On the other hand, it is hard to see how the factor of alien registrants, which is so serious in this State, can be handled so as to bring about a just method of apportionment without some action by Congress unless indeed the President is clothed with the power necessary for the adequate handling of the problems involved.

On the whole it would seem if the Secretary of War can be actively interested that he could readily secure from the Director of the Census a revision of the estimates of population which would remove a large part of the burden unfairly placed upon Connecticut. Then the matter of dealing with the problems presented by the aliens could be taken up by Congress or brought to the attention of the President.

We trust this matter may have your earnest attention and that everything possible may be done to correct the inequality and unfairness from which our State is suffering and by reason of which it is likely in the future to be seriously embarrassed unless some remedy can be had.

Yours, very truly, R. M. BISSELL, Chairman.

HARTFORD, CONN., August 2, 1917.

Provost Marshal Gen. E. H. CROWDER,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We beg to submit herewith certain statements and considerations which we believe demonstrate beyond question that the method recently employed by the War Department for allocating the draft quotas among the several States worked great injustice to the State of Connecticut.

In view of the facts and conclusions hereinafter set forth we feel warranted in making a respectful but most urgent request that steps be at once taken looking to a different and more equitable method of apportioning the ensuing draft levies, and at the same time we strongly insist that due credit should be given to the State of Connecticut in subsequent levies for the excess number of soldiers required to be furnished by it under the inequitable and unfair basis of contribution heretofore used.

Connecticut during the months of March and April, 1917, made a complete census of its male population beyond the age of 15 years and has preserved the records of that census in card form. The date of this census is so recent as to make it perfectly reliable for our present use. The card records disclose the ages, nationalities, occupations, and numerous other characteristics of the individuals recorded thereon, and tabulations made therefrom form in large measure the basis of the statements and arguments hereinafter made.

We beg to call your attention to the fact that the method of apportionment used for the first draft has operated in several ways to impose unfair burdens upon this State.

First. It grossly exaggerated the population of the State, thereby increasing the quota required without adding in any way to the supply of men from whom the quota must be drawn.

The census of 1910 gives Connecticut a population of 1,114,000. In furnishing his recent estimate to the War Department the Director of the Census arbitrarily "estimated" the population now to be 1,719,623. Admitting that our population has considerably increased since 1910, due chiefly to the demands of war industries for labor, nevertheless the most reliable obtainable data indicate a present population of not exceeding 1,350,000. These data are available, but for the sake of brevity are not herein set forth. The total registration in Connecticut, made in accordance with the provisions of the registration act, was 159,890, but of that number 34,276 are married and have dependents as well.

Second. The inclusion of aliens in the registration works injustice to Connecticut.

Of the 159,890 registrants about 58,000 are friendly or neutral aliens who have not taken out their first papers and who are therefore not liable to draft. It will be seen that these aliens in our State increased the total of our registration by more than 50 per cent of what it would have been had they not resided here. And, furthermore, by the arbitrary calculation made by the War Department these 58,000 aliens are made the basis for an increment of population amounting to over 500,000 in number, although it is well known that a very large proportion of these aliens are unmarried laborers and mechanics who represent themselves alone and do not increase the State's population save by their presence here. The injustice involved is made even more glaring when it is remembered that these 58,000 aliens are all exempt from military service and will not contribute one man to Connecticut's draft quota.

There is another and a very unfortunate condition in connection with the presence of these exempt aliens in the State which seems to have been entirely overlooked by the War Department, namely, that they will during the war continue in their present employment, enjoying the highest wage scale ever known in the history of the State, while their compatriots who have become citizens or have taken out their first papers will be compelled to enter the military service of the country. This condition, of course, will tend to estop completely the naturalization of all such exempt aliens. The remedy for this condition would seem to be the drafting of all exempt aliens whose native countries will consent to the process, and the deportation of exempt aliens whose countries will not so consent.

Third. Connecticut's war industries add to its military burden.

When the great war began in 1914 Connecticut already had, as compared with other States, an abnormal number of its male population employed in industries which have since become engaged in the manufacture of munitions and other war material, and the very considerable additions made to our male population since that date have for the most part found employment in such industries. The records of our recent census show that of the approximately 101,000 registrants liable for draft, i. e., citizens or aliens who have taken out their first papers, over 26,000, i. e., more than 25 per cent, are engaged in such work. These registrants to a very large extent will be properly exempt from draft, and therefore, taking into account those who will be exempt by reason of occupation and because they are married and have dependents, it is altogether probable that less than 50 per cent of the total number of 159,890 registrants are actually liable for military service.

Here again it will be noticed that the presence in this State of the great factories which are expected to furnish over 50 per cent of the Nation's supply of arms and munitions augments the number of our registrants, but decreases the available supply of men for military service. Yet under the operation of the system adopted by the War Department the demand made upon Connecticut for soldiers is very sensibly increased because of the large number of munitions workers here.

Fourth. Connecticut's registration was complete.

Having on hand as a result of the recent census a complete list of the male inhabitants required to register under the registration act, the governor of Connecticut caused to be sent to each a notice that he was by law compelled to register with instructions for compliance with such obligation. Lists of those required to register were sent to the registrars in each voting district throughout the State and public notice was given of this procedure. Can it be denied that the existence of this record and the use made of it resulted in a more full and complete registration than would otherwise have been the case, or than was the case in other States where no such aids were available? There can be no doubt, in our opinion, that our census record again swelled our number of registrants, and under the method adopted by the War Department our "estimated" population, thus bringing about another addition to Connecticut's draft allotment. Is it not reasonable to suppose that incomplete registrations may have decreased, perhaps very largely, the quotas of certain other States?

The mere statement of the foregoing reasons is conclusive and does not admit of serious or successful controversion. The case is absolutely demonstrated. The facts alleged are susceptible of proof, and the unfairness of the burden laid upon this State can not be denied. The War Department and the Census Bureau established the existing fallacious and incorrect theory by means of which Connecticut's quota has been determined. It would therefore seem to be in thier power to abandon the misleading and unreliable "estimates of population" which are responsible for serious injustice to this State. There is, indeed, reason to believe that the so-called estimates of population have caused a violation of both the spirit and the letter of section 4 of the law under which the new army is being created. The said section distinctly states:

"Each State * * * shall be required to supply its quota in proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States."

How can it be held that an arbitrary estimate or guess, which, according to the best obtainable information, attributes to Connecticut a population larger by about 400,000, or 30 per cent, than that which the State actually contains, complies with the language of the act just quoted?

We close, therefore, as we began by pressing upon your attention the necessity for forthwith changing the rule of apportionment as applied to Connecticut by the War Department, based on the erroneous and misleading estimate furnished by the Census Bureau, so that a more equitable and just levy may be made in accordance with the facts and considerations herein set forth. And may we not insist that justice to our State can be had only by means of a credit to be given when ensuing quotas are levied? This credit should equal the number in excess of Connecticut's fair allotment apportioned to this State under the recent draft. This excess we believe to be at least 4,000.

Connecticut expects and desires to do her full duty in this war in furnishing men, money, materials, and service of all kinds for the Nation's use, as it has done in every previous war in which this country has been engaged. Great demands will be made upon this State, but they will be cheerfully met if justly imposed.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———, Chairman.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the United Press, correcting a misapprehension that has occurred in regard to its attitude on the subject of prohibition, through the proceedings of another organization of the same name. I ask that the statement may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Cleveland Press, Apr. 19, 1917.]

UNITED PRESS SUES TO ENJOIN USE OF ITS NAME.

The United Press Associations of New York Thursday filed suit in the Federal court here for an injunction against O. K. Shimansky to prevent him from sending out antiprohibition propaganda and other publicity matter in such a way as to make it appear to come from the United Press.

Shimansky has been conducting a publicity campaign mainly in behalf of the liquor interests through a concern incorporated in Ohio by him as the "United Press Association Co."

In sending propaganda to newspapers throughout the country, however, Shimansky used the name "United Press Association," omitting the word company.

The petition filed to-day asks that the injunction perpetually restrain Shimansky from using the name "United Press" or "United Press Association," unless accompanied with the following explanatory statement:

"Not connected with the United Press Associations."

AFFIDAVITS FILED.

John H. Perry, counsel for the United Press, supported his petition with a large number of affidavits from newspaper publishers and Members of Congress, stating they received liquor-propaganda literature from Shimansky under the name of the United Press Association.

"The Cleveland concern is a paid publicity bureau," said Perry to-day. "Its aim is to get advertisements for special interests into the newspapers as news matter.

"The Cleveland concern has simply been masquerading under the name of the United Press. As a consequence the United Press has been flooded with letters from its clients objecting to the unfair use of its name. A gross deception has been practiced upon United Press clients and a fraud and imposition upon the public generally. We propose to put an end to such unfair practices."

Federal Judge Westenhaver immediately granted an order returnable April 28, under which the defendants must show cause why they should not be compelled to state in all their publicity that they are not connected with the United Press of New York.

ACTIVITIES OF THE INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have received a number of letters and communications from citizens of my State and other States calling attention to the pernicious activities, the crimes, and violence of the Industrial Workers of the World and other kindred organizations against the Federal Government and requesting that Congress enact additional legislation, if the present law is inadequate to handle the situation, and punish the acts of the members of such organizations, which are such a menace to the Nation.

I have also received a number of communications asking the internment or deportation of a number of naturalized citizens who are disloyal to the Government and requesting the Federal Government to immediately take the necessary steps in the various districts of the United States to cite before the Federal courts those persons who obtained naturalization papers fraudulently or who are disloyal and have those papers canceled, and that after the cancellation of the same the holders of the papers be either interned or deported.

I did not care to burden the RECORD, but felt that the substance of the communications should be stated at this time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have received a considerable number of communications of like nature from Montana as those referred to by the Senator from Utah as having come from his State. I think a very serious situation prevails in regard to the Industrial Workers of the World in Montana and other Western States. I believe there is need for some additional legislation to cope with such conditions. I am now engaged in giving that subject attention, in connection with other Senators and the Department of Justice, and I hope in the near future there may be some legislation to meet the requirements of the situation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana what steps have been taken by the State authorities of Montana to curb the activities of the Industrial Workers of the World?

Mr. MYERS. I can not say. I am not fully informed on that subject. I suppose the State officials have taken whatever steps they may have felt authorized to take under the laws of the State of Montana, when specific instances of infractions of the law have come to their attention; but I am informed that there is not adequate law on the statute books of Montana to handle the evils which arise from the situation which exists there. It is claimed there is not sufficient law on the statute books of the United States, either.

Further answering the question of the Senator from Washington, I do not know just what steps have been taken by the State authorities of the State of Montana, but I am told they are doing the best they can under the circumstances.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The laws of Montana and the constitution of Montana not only authorize but fix the duty upon the State and municipal authorities of the State to protect life and property within the borders of the State. One of the peculiar reserved powers of the States in the Constitution of the United States is to preserve domestic order, to protect the people of the States against domestic violence.

This Industrial Workers of the World organization, at least the leaders of it, are outlaws, or ought to be made outlaws, because their official utterances, their printed literature, their speakers, advocate murder, and openly advocate it. They openly advocate the destruction of property. The fact of the case is there are very few crimes in the calendar that these agitators do not openly advocate in their oral and written propaganda.

I call attention to this in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Montana because, while I agree that in the last resort, if there is no safety in the authorities of the State, the Federal Government ought and must intervene for the preservation of a republican form of government—if under no other clause of the Constitution, the necessity for the preservation of that sort of order and of safety of life and of property and of property rights held essential for any form of government as the only basis upon which a policy of government can be formulated. Somewhat the same situation exists in the State of Washington.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington what has been done by the State authorities of Washington to curb this evil?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They have called on the Federal Government for assistance. That is about all they have done, and I think it is a reflection upon any great State of the Union that it should. I hope that ultimately the State of Washington and the State of Montana will not say that the State is unable to protect itself.

Mr. MYERS. It has not done so yet. I will ask the Senator what has been done in respect to this situation, particularly in the city of Spokane, which has experienced considerable trouble, according to newspaper accounts?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They have organized some military companies there; and whenever there has been a military company organized, even though it is only a home guard, I have noticed that the trouble subsides at once. My opinion is that the proper way to deal with the matter is with a sufficient preparation of military force to meet the issue of force which those people put forth. The Industrial Workers of the World have not any special privilege of using force to redress wrong. If they appeal to that sort of a decision of the question, it is necessary for the people of the various communities to meet them upon their own ground. Wherever home guards have been organized, wherever there is a company of militia, or wherever there is an organization of United States troops, however small it may be, I have noticed that this trouble disappears.

The organization to which the Senator refers seems to express great surprise and horror and indignation if any of their constitutional rights are violated, and yet they propose to violate the constitutional rights of everybody else. That is the issue. They seem to claim some sort of a special privilege of committing murder and arson and sabotage, all of which they openly teach in their literature.

Mr. President, in this connection I desire to state I have here a communication from a lumber company in the State of Washington, in the nature of a petition, which I desire to present, and at the same time I present a communication from the employees of this lumber company—the Clear Lake Lumber Co., of Clear Lake, Wash. It is particularly interesting.

One of the serious features of the Industrial Workers of the World's agitation in the Northwest has been the curtailment of lumber production, one of the things that are essential to our industries, and especially so to the conduct of the war, in the building of ships. These employees state in this communication that the leaders of the Industrial Workers of the World have threatened violence against them if they do not strike. They say they do not want to strike, but that the agitators urge that action. All of the members of the Industrial Workers of the World, of course, are not criminals of this description; some of them are merely deluded followers; and I digress to say, what really is obvious and ought not to be necessary to say, that there should at all times be a clear line drawn between a legitimate labor union, with its reasonable demands, nearly all of which I have supported and do support, and the advocates of murder and dynamite that are leading the Industrial Workers of the World organization.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will permit me to make an observation right here, I desire to say that I concur in his denunciation of the Industrial Workers of the World leaders, and also what he says in behalf of well-governed and legitimate organized labor. There has recently been no particular instance of the destruction of property of which I know in Montana. I agree with the Senator that the State authorities should do all in their power to keep down disorder and to enforce the law; but I think, at the same time, there might well be some additional legislation by Congress on the subject. The trouble in Montana has been not so much open violence but mostly incendiary and inflammatory talk, seditious talk, threats, abuse of the Government, abuse of all government and organized society, denunciation of the war, fomenting strikes, and inciting disturbance. I think some of the talk has been treasonable, and if there is no law to punish such talk some should be provided, and I hope it may be. Such conduct should not be allowed to continue in this crisis.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think a great deal can be done by the enforcement of the existing laws, although I am ready to join with the Senator from Montana in promoting the passage of any additional legislation that may appear to be necessary.

There is just one other matter in connection with this representation from the Clear Lake Lumber Co. to which I desire to call attention, because it is quite interesting. The employees and the company both are willing to agree upon an eight-hour day. The question of an eight-hour day is one of the issues that have been the legitimate subject of dispute between the lumber companies and their employees, entirely distinct from this propaganda of crime and violence to which I have been referring. So far as I am concerned, I believe in an eight-hour day, and I think that Congress believes in an eight-hour day, for Congress has passed numerous laws fixing eight hours as the standard of a day's work in nearly all of the Government establishments. In the navy yards and other work which the Government is carrying on, and the factories for Army equipment, which are conducted under the War Department, the eight-hour day has been fixed by act of Congress. The same principles which induced that legislation as applicable to Government work apply in any industry, whether it is conducted by the Government or by a private company. This company which employs these men points out, however, that it is impossible for them to establish an eight-hour day in their enterprise and compete with other people who do not establish an eight-hour day. I do not know that they are right in that, because I believe—and I have it from employers of labor, from men who have made a scientific study of the proposition—that, as a rule, they get more and better work, they have a better class of employees, and a larger sum total of results for their labor on the basis of an eight-hour day than on the basis of a 10-hour or a longer day.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. BRADY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Washington whether it is his intention to have these communications to which he refers printed in the RECORD or to have the Secretary read them?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Secretary to read certain portions of the communications relative to the matter of which I have been speaking, and which I have marked in pencil.

Mr. BRADY. It is very important that the Senate should have all of the information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the portions of the communications as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

CLEAR LAKE LUMBER CO.,
Clear Lake, Wash., August 4, 1917.

The compulsory eight-hour law in the lumber business or a standard day would go a long way toward settling this labor difficulty. But something must be done in order to make the loafers, strikers, idlers, and disturbers of the peace go to work, and the Industrial Workers of the World, with their propaganda of treason and revolution, must be stamped out before we will have peace.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The next letter from which I ask the Secretary to read is from the employees, the laboring men, who are working for the Clear Lake Lumber Co.

The Secretary read as follows:

Upon careful investigation we find that the lumber manufacturers and loggers on the Pacific coast are not opposed to an eight-hour day, provided it can be made universal in the lumber industry throughout the United States. We also believe that the lumber manufacturers can not run (except for local consumption) on an eight-hour day and pay present scale of wages and compete with the South, employing colored labor on a 10 and 11 hour day, as well as other lumber-producing sections of the United States.

We have steady employment and the camps and mills of this company are still in operation, although we have been threatened with violence by the Industrial Workers of the World, but through our firm stand for our personal rights we have been able to protect ourselves, although we have been told we will be marked men if we do not strike and shut down the company's operations. These men that are stirring up the trouble are not regular employees and are mostly strangers to us. We do not even know that they are lumber workers.

We do not believe that an eight-hour day can be gained in the lumber industry on the Pacific coast by strikes and walkouts, and we see no reason why the President of the United States should not take the same attitude in favor of the men working in the lumber industry as he did the railroad men last year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think it would be interesting in connection with the discussion we have just had to have printed in the RECORD the preamble to the constitution of the Industrial Workers of the World, which shows the real objects and purposes of this organization. I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PREAMBLE OF THE INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD'S CONSTITUTION.

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be on peace so long as hunger and want are found among the millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade-unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade-unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade-unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interest in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

Knowing, therefore, that such an organization is absolutely necessary for our emancipation, we unite under the following constitution:

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, before this subject is dropped I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to the point at which the Federal Government is particularly interested in the teaching, the propaganda, and the actions of the Industrial Workers of the World. The Industrial Workers of the World teach resistance to all authority. So far as they resist the ordinary authorities, the State and the local governments must take care of that situation; but this organization is taking advantage of the present war to stir up opposition to the Federal Government in its conduct of the war. They are advising and exhorting everyone to disregard the Federal laws, particularly the laws that have to do with the conduct of the war and the selective draft. When they do that the Federal Government has a real and vital interest in what they are trying to accomplish, and I hope that all Senators will study the subject carefully and be ready with suggestions which may aid us to enact laws to cope with this very real danger.

DECISION IN THE MILLIGAN CASE (S. DOC. 77).

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, and also to have printed as a public document, the decision of the Supreme Court in the Milligan case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears none.

EX PARTE MILLIGAN.

1. Circuit courts, as well as the judges thereof, are authorized by the fourteenth section of the judiciary act to issue the writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of commitment, and they have jurisdiction, except in cases where the privilege of the writ is suspended, to hear and determine the question, whether the party is entitled to be discharged.

2. The usual course of proceeding is for the court, on the application of the prisoner for a writ of habeas corpus, to issue the writ, and on its return to hear and dispose of the case; but where the cause of imprisonment is fully shown by the petition the court may, without issuing the writ, consider and determine whether upon the facts presented in the petition the prisoner, if brought before the court, would be discharged.

3. When the circuit court renders a final judgment refusing to discharge the prisoner he may bring the case here by writ of error; and if the judges of the circuit court, being opposed in opinion, can render no judgment, he may have the point upon which the disagreement happens certified to this tribunal.

4. A petition for a writ of habeas corpus, duly presented, is the institution of a cause on behalf of the petitioner; and the allowance or refusal of the process, as well as the subsequent disposition of the prisoner, is matter of law and not of discretion.

5. A person arrested after the passage of the act of March 3, 1863, "relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," and under the authority of the said act, was entitled to his discharge if not indicted or presented by the grand jury convened at the first subsequent term of the circuit or district court of the United States for the district.

6. The omission to furnish a list of the persons arrested to the judges of the circuit or district court, as provided in the said act, did not impair the right of such person, if not indicted or presented, to his discharge.

7. Military commissions organized during the late Civil War in a State not invaded and not engaged in rebellion, in which the Federal courts were open and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their judicial functions, had no jurisdiction to try, convict, or sentence for any criminal offense a citizen who was neither a resident of a rebellious State nor a prisoner of war, nor a person in the military or naval service, and Congress could not invest them with any such power.

8. The guaranty of trial by jury contained in the Constitution was intended for a state of war, as well as a state of peace, and is equally binding upon rulers and people at all times and under all circumstances.

9. The Federal authority having been unopposed in the State of Indiana and the Federal courts open for the trial of offenses and the redress of grievances, the usages of war could not under the Constitution afford any sanction for the trial there of a citizen in civil life not connected with the military or naval service by a military tribunal for any offense whatever.

10. Cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, in time of war or public danger, are excepted from the necessity of presentment or indictment by a grand jury, and the right of trial by jury in such cases is subject to the same exceptions.

11. Neither the President, nor Congress, nor the judiciary can disturb any one of the safeguards of civil liberty incorporated into the Constitution, except so far as the right is given to suspend in certain cases the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus.

12. A citizen not connected with the military service and resident in a State where the courts are open and in the proper exercise of their jurisdiction can not, even when the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is suspended, be tried, convicted, or sentenced otherwise than by the ordinary courts of law.

13. Suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course, and on its return the court decides whether the applicant is denied the right of proceeding any further.

14. A person who is a resident of a loyal State where he was arrested, who was never resident in any State engaged in rebellion, nor connected with the military or naval service, can not be regarded as a prisoner of war.

Mr. Justice Davis delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 10th day of May, 1865, Lambdin P. Milligan presented a petition to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Indiana to be discharged from an alleged unlawful imprisonment. The case made by the petition is this: Milligan is a citizen of the United States; has lived for 20 years in Indiana; and, at the time of the grievances complained of, was not and never had been in the military or naval service of the United States. On the 5th day of October, 1864, while at home, he was arrested by order of Gen. Alvin P. Hovey, commanding the military district of Indiana, and has ever since been kept in close confinement.

On the 21st day of October, 1864, he was brought before a military commission, convened at Indianapolis by order of Gen. Hovey, tried on certain charges and specifications, found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged and the sentence ordered to be executed on Friday, the 19th day of May, 1865.

On the 2d day of January, 1865, after the proceedings of the military commission were at an end, the Circuit Court of the United States for Indiana met at Indianapolis and empaneled a grand jury, who were charged to inquire whether the laws of the United States had been violated and, if so, to make presentments. The court adjourned on the 27th day of January, having, prior thereto, discharged from further service the grand jury, who did not find any bill of indictment or make any presentment against Milligan for any offense whatever, and in fact, since his imprisonment, no bill of indictment has been found or presentment made against him by any grand jury of the United States.

Milligan insists that said military commission had no jurisdiction to try him upon the charges preferred, or upon any charges whatever, because he was a citizen of the United States and the State of Indiana and had not been, since the commencement of the late rebellion, a resident of any of the States whose citizens were arrayed against the Government, and that the right of trial by jury was guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the United States.

The prayer of the petition was that under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," he may be brought before the court and either turned over to the proper civil tribunal to be proceeded against according to the law of the land or discharged from custody altogether.

With the petition were filed the order for the commission, the charges and specifications, the findings of the court, with the order of the War Department reciting that the sentence was approved by the President of the United States and directing that it be carried into execution without delay. The petition was presented and filed in open court by the counsel for Milligan; at the same time the district attorney of the United States for Indiana appeared, and by the agreement of counsel the application was submitted to the court. The opinions of the judges of the circuit court were opposed on three questions, which are certified to the Supreme Court:

First. "On the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, ought a writ of habeas corpus to be issued?"

Second. "On the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, ought the said Lambdin P. Milligan to be discharged from custody as in said petition prayed?"

Third. "Whether, upon the facts stated in said petition and exhibits, the military commission mentioned therein had jurisdiction legally to try and sentence said Milligan in manner and form as in said petition and exhibits is stated?"

The importance of the main question presented by this record can not be overstated, for it involves the very framework of the Government and the fundamental principles of American liberty.

During the late wicked Rebellion the temper of the times did not allow that calmness in deliberation and discussion so necessary to a correct conclusion of a purely judicial question. Then considerations of safety were mingled with the exercise of power, and feelings and interests prevailed which are happily terminated. Now that the public safety is assured, this question, as well as all others, can be discussed and decided without passion or the admixture of any element not required to form a legal judgment. We approach the investigation of this case fully sensible of the magnitude of the inquiry and the necessity of full and cautious deliberation.

But we are met with a preliminary objection. It is insisted that the circuit court of Indiana had no authority to certify these questions, and that we are without jurisdiction to hear and determine them.

The sixth section of the "act to amend the judicial system of the United States," approved April 29, 1802, declares "that whenever any question shall occur before a circuit court upon which the opinions of the judges shall be opposed, the point upon which the disagreement shall happen shall, during the same term, upon the request of either party or their counsel, be stated under the direction of the judges and certified under the seal of the court to the Supreme Court at their next session to be held thereafter, and shall by the said court be finally decided; and the decision of the Supreme Court and their order in the premises shall be remitted to the circuit court and be there entered of record, and shall have effect according to the nature of the said judgment and order: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the cause from proceeding, if in the opinion of the court further proceedings can be had without prejudice to the merits."

It is under this provision of law that a circuit court has authority to certify any question to the Supreme Court for adjudication. The inquiry, therefore, is whether the case of Milligan is brought within its terms.

It was admitted at the bar that the circuit court had jurisdiction to entertain the application for the writ of habeas corpus and to hear and determine it, and it could not be denied, for the power is expressly given in the fourteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789, as well as in the later act of 1863. Chief Justice Marshall, in Bollman's case (4 Cranch, 75), construed this branch of the judiciary act to authorize the courts as well as the judges to issue the writ for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of the commitment, and this construction has never been departed from. But it is maintained with earnestness and ability that a certificate of division of opinion can occur only in a cause, and that the proceeding by a party, moving for a writ of habeas corpus, does not become a cause until after the writ has been issued and a return made.

Independently of the provisions of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863, relating to habeas corpus, on which the petitioner bases his claim for relief, and which we will presently consider, can this position be sustained?

It is true that it is usual for a court, on application for a writ of habeas corpus, to issue the writ, and, on the return, to dispose of the case; but the court can elect to waive the issuing of the writ and consider whether, upon the facts presented in the petition, the prisoner, if brought before it, could be discharged. One of the very points on which the case of Tobias Watkins, reported in Third Peters (p. 193), turned was whether, if the writ was issued, the petitioner would be remanded upon the case which he had made.

The Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The cause of imprisonment is shown as fully by the petitioner as it could appear on the return of the writ; consequently the writ ought not to be awarded if the court is satisfied that the prisoner would be remanded to prison."

The judges of the Circuit Court of Indiana were, therefore, warranted by an express decision of this court in refusing the writ, if satisfied that the prisoner on his own showing was rightfully detained.

But it is contended, if they differed about the lawfulness of the imprisonment, and could render no judgment, the prisoner is remediless; and can not have the disputed question certified under the act of 1802. His remedy is complete by writ of error or appeal, if the court renders a final judgment refusing to discharge him; but if he should be so unfortunate as to be placed in the predicament of having the court divided on the question whether he should live or die, he is hopeless and without remedy. He wishes the vital question settled, not by a single judge at his chambers but by the highest tribunal known to the Constitution; and yet the privilege is denied him; because the circuit court consists of two judges instead of one.

Such a result was not in the contemplation of the legislature of 1802; and the language used by it can not be construed to mean any such thing. The clause under consideration was introduced to further the ends of justice, by obtaining a speedy settlement of important questions where the judges might be opposed in opinion.

The act of 1802 so changed the judicial system that the circuit court, instead of three, was composed of two judges; and, without this provision or a kindred one, if the judges differed, the difference would remain, the question be unsettled, and justice denied. The decisions of this court upon the provisions of this section have been numerous. In United States v. Daniel (6 Wheaton, 542), the court, in holding that a division of the judges on a motion for a new trial could not be certified, say: "That the question must be one which arises in a cause depending before the court relative to a proceeding belonging to the cause." Testing Milligan's case by this rule of law, is it not apparent that it is rightfully here; and that we are compelled to answer the questions on which the judges below were opposed in opinion? If, in the sense of the law, the proceeding for the writ of habeas corpus was the "cause" of the party applying for it, then it is evident that the "cause" was pending before the court, and that the questions certified arose out of it, belonged to it, and were matters of right and not of discretion.

But it is argued, that the proceeding does not ripen into a cause until there are two parties to it.

This we deny. It was the cause of Milligan when the petition was presented to the circuit court. It would have been the cause of both parties, if the court had issued the writ and brought those who held Milligan in custody before it. Webster defines the word "cause" thus: "A suit or action in court; any legal process which a party institutes to obtain his demand, or by which he seeks his right, or supposed right"—and he says, "this is a legal, scriptural, and popular use of the word, coinciding nearly with case, from cado, and action, from ago, to urge and drive."

In any legal sense, action, suit, and cause, are convertible terms. Milligan supposed he had a right to test the validity of his trial and sentence; and the proceeding which he set in operation for that purpose was his "cause" or "suit." It was the only one by which he could recover his liberty. He was powerless to do more; he could neither instruct the judges nor control their action, and should not suffer because, without fault of his, they were unable to render a judgment. But the true meaning to the term "suit" has been given by this court. One of the questions in Weston v. City Council of Charlestoa (2 Peters, 449), was, whether a writ of prohibition was a suit; and Chief Justice Marshall says: "The term is certainly a comprehensive one, and is understood to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy which the law affords him." Certainly, Milligan pursued the only remedy which the law afforded him.

Again, in Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheaton, 264), he says: "In law language a suit is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice." Also, "To commence a suit is to demand something by the institution of process in a court of justice. and to prosecute the suit is to continue that demand." When Milligan demanded his release by the proceeding relating to habeas corpus he commenced a suit, and he has since prosecuted it in all the ways known to the law. One of the questions in Holmes v. Jennison et al. (14 Peters, 540), was whether under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act a proceeding for a writ of habeas corpus was a "suit." Chief Justice Taney held that "if a party is unlawfully imprisoned, the writ of habeas corpus is his appropriate legal remedy. It is his suit in court to recover his liberty." There was much diversity of opinion on another ground of jurisdiction; but that, in the sense of the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, the proceeding by habeas corpus was a suit was not controverted by any except Baldwin, justice, and he thought that "suit" and "cause" as used in the section mean the same thing.

The court do not say that a return must be made, and the parties appear and begin to try the case before it is a suit. When the petition is filed and the writ prayed for, it is a suit—the suit of the party making the application. If it is a suit under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act when the proceedings are begun, it is by all the analogies of the law equally a suit under the sixth section of the act of 1802.

But it is argued that there must be two parties to the suit, because the point is to be stated upon the request of "either party or their counsel."

Such a literal and technical construction would defeat the very purpose the legislature had in view, which was to enable any party to bring the case here when the point in controversy was a matter of right and not of discretion; and the words "either party," in order to prevent a failure of justice, must be construed as words of enlargement and not of restriction. Although this case is here ex parte, it was not considered by the court below without notice having been given to the party supposed to have an interest in the detention of the prisoner. The statements of the record show that this is not only a fair but conclusive inference. When the counsel for Milligan presented to the court the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, Mr. Hanna, the district attorney for Indiana, also appeared, and by agreement the application was submitted to the court, who took the case under advisement and on the next day announced their inability to agree and made the certificate. It is clear that Mr. Hanna did not represent the petitioner, and why is his appearance entered? It admits of no other solution than this, that he was informed of the application and appeared on behalf of the Government to contest it. The Government was the prosecutor of Milligan, who claimed that his imprisonment was illegal and sought in the only way he could to recover his liberty. The case was a grave one, and the court unquestionably directed that the law officer of the Government should be informed of it. He very properly appeared, and, as the facts were uncontroverted and the difficulty was in the application of the law, there was no useful purpose to be obtained in issuing the writ. The cause was therefore submitted to the court for their consideration and determination.

But Milligan claimed his discharge from custody by virtue of the act of Congress "relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863. Did that act confer jurisdiction on the Circuit Court of Indiana to hear this case?

In interpreting a law the motives which must have operated with the legislature in passing it are proper to be considered. This law was passed in a time of great national peril, when our heritage of free government was in danger.

An armed rebellion against the national authority, of greater proportions than history affords an example of, was raging; and the public safety required that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should be suspended. The President had practically suspended it, and detained suspected persons in custody without trial; but his authority to do this was questioned. It was claimed that Congress alone could exercise this power; and that the legislature, and not the President, should judge of the political considerations on which the right to suspend it rested. The privilege of this great writ had never before been withheld from the citizen; and as the exigence of the times demanded immediate action, it was of the highest importance that the lawfulness of the suspension should be fully established. It was under these circumstances, which were such as to arrest the attention of the country, that this law was passed. The President was authorized by it to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, whenever, in his judgment, the public safety required; and he did, by proclamation, bearing date the 15th of September, 1863, reciting, among other things, the authority of this statute, suspend it. The suspension of the writ does not authorize the arrest of any one, but simply denies to one arrested the privilege of this writ in order to obtain his liberty.

It is proper, therefore, to inquire under what circumstances the courts could rightfully refuse to grant this writ, and when the citizen was at liberty to invoke its aid.

The second and third sections of the law are explicit on these points. The language used is plain and direct, and the meaning of the Congress can not be mistaken. The public safety demanded, if the President thought proper to arrest a suspected person, that he should not be required to give the cause of his detention on return to a writ of habeas corpus. But it was not contemplated that such person should be detained in custody beyond a certain fixed period, unless certain judicial proceedings, known to the common law, were commenced against him. The Secretaries of State and War were directed to furnish to the judges of the courts of the United States a list of the names of all parties, not prisoners of war, resident in their respective jurisdictions, who then were or afterwards should be held in custody by the authority of the President, and who were citizens of States in which the administration of the laws in the Federal tribunals was unimpaired. After the list was furnished, if a grand jury of the district convened and adjourned, and did not indict or present one of the persons thus named, he was entitled to his discharge; and it was the duty of the judge of the court to order him brought before him to be discharged, if he desired it. The refusal or omission to furnish the list could not operate to the injury of any one who was not indicted or presented by the grand jury; for, if 20 days had elapsed from the time of his arrest and the termination of the session of the grand jury, he was equally entitled to his discharge as if the list were furnished; and any credible person, on petition verified by affidavit, could obtain the judge's order for that purpose.

Milligan, in his application to be released from imprisonment, averred the existence of every fact necessary under the terms of this law to give the Circuit Court of Indiana jurisdiction. If he was detained in custody by the order of the President, otherwise than as a prisoner of war; if he was a citizen of Indiana and had never been in the military or naval service, and the grand jury of the district had met, after he had been arrested, for a period of 20 days, and adjourned without taking any proceedings against him, then the court had the right to entertain his petition and determine the lawfulness of his imprisonment. Because the word "court" is not found in the body of the second section, it was argued at the bar that the application should have been made to a judge of the court, and not to the court itself; but this is not so, for power is expressly conferred in the last proviso of the section on the court equally with a judge of it to discharge from imprisonment. It was the manifest design of Congress to secure a certain remedy by which any one, deprived of liberty, could obtain it, if there was a judicial failure to find cause of offense against him. Courts are not always in session, and can adjourn on the discharge of the grand jury; and before those, who are in confinement, could take proper steps to procure their liberation. To provide for this contingency, authority was given to the judges out of court to grant relief to any party who could show that, under the law, he should be no longer restrained of his liberty.

It was insisted that Milligan's case was defective, because it did not state that the list was furnished to the judges; and, therefore, it was impossible to say under which section of the act it was presented.

It is not easy to see how this omission could affect the question of jurisdiction. Milligan could not know that the list was furnished, unless the judges volunteered to tell him; for the law did not require that any record should be made of it or anybody but the judges informed of it. Why aver the fact when the truth of the matter was apparent to the court without an averment? How can Milligan be barmed by the absence of the averment, when he states that he was under arrest for more than 60 days before the court and grand jury which should have considered his case met at Indianapolis? It is apparent, therefore, that under the habeas corpus act of 1863 the circuit court of Indiana had complete jurisdiction to adjudicate upon this case, and, if the judges could not agree on questions vital to the progress of the cause, they had the authority (as we have shown in a previous part of this opinion), and it was their duty to certify those questions of disagreement to this court for final decision. It was argued that a final decision on the questions presented ought not to be made, because the parties who were directly concerned in the arrest and detention of Milligan, were not before the court; and their rights might be prejudiced by the answer which should be given to those questions. But this court can not know what return will be made to the writ of habeas corpus when issued; and it is very clear that no one is concluded upon any question that may be raised to that return. In the sense of the law of 1802, which authorized a certificate of division, a final decision means final upon the points certified; final upon the court below, so that it is estopped from any adverse ruling in all the subsequent proceedings of the cause.

But it is said that this case is ended, as the presumption is that Milligan was hanged in pursuance of the order of the President.

Although we have no judicial information on the subject, yet the inference is that he is alive; for otherwise learned counsel would not appear for him and urge this court to decide his case. It can never be in this country of written constitution and laws, with a judicial department to interpret them, that any Chief Magistrate would be so far forgetful of his duty as to order the execution of a man who denied the jurisdiction that tried and convicted him after his case was before Federal judges with power to decide it, who, being unable to agree on the grave questions involved, had, according to known law, sent it to the Supreme Court of the United States for decision. But even the suggestion is injurious to the Executive, and we dismiss it from further consideration. There is, therefore, nothing to hinder this court from an investigation of the merits of this controversy.

The controlling question in the case is this: Upon the facts stated in Milligan's petition, and the exhibits filed, had the military commission mentioned in it jurisdiction, legally, to try and sentence him?

Milligan, not a resident of one of the rebellious States or a prisoner of war, but a citizen of Indiana for 20 years past and never in the military or naval service, is, while at his home, arrested by the military power of the United States, imprisoned, and, on certain criminal charges preferred against him, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged by a military commission, organized under the direction of the military commander of the military district of Indiana. Had this tribunal the legal power and authority to try and punish this man?

No graver question was ever considered by this court, nor one which more nearly concerns the rights of the whole people; for it is the birthright of every American citizen, when charged with crime, to be tried and punished according to law. The power of punishment is alone through the means which the laws have provided for that purpose, and if they are ineffectual there is an immunity from punishment, no matter how great an offender the individual may be, or how much his crimes may have shocked the sense of justice of the country or endangered its safety. By the protection of the law human rights are secured; withdraw that protection and they are at the mercy of wicked rulers, or the clamor of an excited people. If there was law to justify this military trial, it is not our province to interfere; if there was not, it is our duty to declare the nullity of the whole proceedings. The decision of this question does not depend on argument or judicial precedents, numerous and highly illustrative as they are. These precedents inform us of the extent of the struggle to preserve liberty and to relieve those in civil life from military trials. The founders of our Government were familiar with the history of that struggle, and secured in a written Constitution every right which the people had wrested from power during a contest of ages. By that Constitution and the laws authorized by it this question must be determined. The provisions of that instrument on the administration of criminal justice are too plain and direct to leave room for misconstruction or doubt of their true meaning. Those applicable to this case are found in that clause of the original Constitution which says, "That the trial of all crimes, except in case of impeachment, shall be by jury"; and in the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the amendments. The fourth proclaims the right to be secure in person and effects against unreasonable search and seizure, and directs that a judicial warrant shall not issue "without proof of probable cause supported by oath or affirmation." The fifth declares "that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on presentment by a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." And the sixth guarantees the right of trial by jury in such manner and with such regulations that, with upright judges, impartial juries, and an able bar, the innocent will be saved and the guilty punished. It is in these words: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." These securities for personal liberty thus embodied were such as wisdom and experience had demonstrated to be necessary for the protection of those accused of crime. And so strong was the sense of the country of their importance, and so jealous were the people that these rights, highly prized, might be denied them by implication, that when the original Constitution was proposed for adoption it encountered severe opposition, and but for the belief that it would be so amended as to embrace them it would never have been ratified.

Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors, for even these provisions, expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than 70 years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Have any of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution been violated in the case of Milligan; and if so, what are they?

Every trial involves the exercise of judicial power; and from what source did the military commission that tried him derive their authority? Certainly no part of the judicial power of the country was conferred on them, because the Constitution expressly vests it "in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," and it is not pretended that the commission was a court ordained and established by Congress. They can not justify on the mandate of the President, because he is controlled by law and has his appropriate sphere of duty, which is to execute, not to make, the laws; and there is "no unwritten criminal code to which resort can be had as a source of jurisdiction."

But it is said that the jurisdiction is complete under the "laws and usages of war."

It can serve no useful purpose to inquire what those laws and usages are, whence they originated, where found, and on whom they operate; they can never be applied to citizens in States which have upheld the authority of the Government and where the courts are open and their process unobstructed. This court has judicial knowledge that in Indiana the Federal authority was always unopposed and its courts always open to hear criminal accusations and redress grievances; and no usage of war could sanction a military trial there for any offense whatever of a citizen in civil life, in nowise connected with the military service. Congress could grant no such power; and to the honor of our National Legislature, be it said, it has never been provoked by the state of the country even to attempt its exercise. One of the plainest constitutional provisions was therefore infringed when Milligan was tried by a court not ordained and established by Congress and not composed of judges appointed during good behavior.

Why was he not delivered to the Circuit Court of Indiana to be proceeded against according to law? No reason of necessity could be urged against it, because Congress had declared penalties against the offenses charged, provided for their punishment, and directed that court to hear and determine them. And soon after this military tribunal was ended the circuit court met, peacefully transacted its business, and adjourned. It needed no bayonets to protect it and required no military aid to execute its judgments. It was held in a State eminently distinguished for patriotism, by judges commissioned during the Rebellion, who were provided with juries, upright, intelligent, and selected by a marshal appointed by the President. The Government had no right to conclude that Milligan if guilty, would not receive in that court merited punishment, for its records disclose that it was constantly engaged in the trial of similar offenses and was never interrupted in its administration of criminal justice. If it was dangerous, in the distracted condition of affairs, to leave Milligan unrestrained of his liberty, because he "conspired against the Government, afforded aid and comfort to rebels, and incited the people to insurrection," the law said arrest him, confine him closely, render him powerless to do further mischief, and then present his case to the grand jury of the district with proofs of his guilt, and if indicted try him according to the course of the common law. If this had been done, the Constitution would have been vindicated, the law of 1863 enforced, and the securities for personal liberty preserved and defended.

Another guaranty of freedom was broken when Milligan was denied a trial by jury. The great minds of the country have differed on the correct interpretation to be given to various provisions of the Federal Constitution, and judicial decision has been often invoked to settle their true meaning; but until recently no one ever doubted that the right of trial by jury was fortified in the organic law against the power of attack. It is now assailed; but if ideas can be expressed in words and language has any meaning, this right—one of the most valuable in a free country—is preserved to everyone accused of crime who is not attached to the Army or Navy or militia in actual service. The sixth amendment affirms that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury," language broad enough to embrace all persons and cases; but the fifth, recognizing the necessity of an indictment or presentment before anyone can be held to answer for high crimes, "excepts cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war, or public danger"; and the framers of the Constitution, doubtless, meant to limit the right of trial by jury, in the sixth amendment, to those persons who were subject to indictment or presentment in the fifth.

The discipline necessary to the efficiency of the Army and Navy required other and swifter modes of trial than are furnished by the common law courts; and, in pursuance of the power conferred by the Constitution, Congress has declared the kinds of trial, and the manner in which they shall be conducted, for offenses committed while the party is in the military or naval service. Every one connected with these branches of the public service is amenable to the jurisdiction which Congress has created for their government, and, while thus serving, surrenders his right to be tried by the civil courts. All other persons, citizens of States where the courts are open, if charged with crime, are guaranteed the inestimable privilege of trial by jury. This privilege is a vital principle, underlying the whole administration of criminal justice; it is not held by sufferance and can not be frittered away on any plea of State or political necessity. When peace prevails, and the authority of the Government is undisputed, there is no difficulty of preserving the safeguards of liberty, for the ordinary modes of trial are never neglected, and no one wishes it otherwise, but if society is disturbed by civil commotion—if the passions of men are aroused and the restraints of law weakened, if not disregarded—these safeguards need, and should receive, the watchful care of those intrusted with the guardianship of the Constitution and laws. In no other way can we transmit to posterity unimpaired the blessings of liberty, consecrated by the sacrifices of the Revolution.

It is claimed that martial law covers with its broad mantle the proceedings of this military commission. The proposition is this: That in a time of war the commander of an armed force (if in his opinion the exigencies of the country demand it, and of which he is to judge), has the power, within the lines of his military district, to suspend all civil rights and their remedies, and subject citizens as well as soldiers to the rule of his will; and in the exercise of his lawful authority can not be restrained, except by his superior officer or the President of the United States.

If this position is sound to the extent claimed, then when war exists, foreign or domestic, and the country is subdivided into military departments for mere convenience, the commander of one of them can, if he chooses, within his limits, on the plea of necessity, with the approval of the Executive substitute military force for and to the exclusion of the laws, and punish all persons, as he thinks right and proper, without fixed or certain rules.

The statement of this proposition shows its importance, for, if true, republican government is a failure, and there is an end of liberty regulated by law. Martial law established on such a basis destroys every guaranty of the Constitution and effectually renders the "military independent of and superior to the civil power"—the attempt to do which by the King of Great Britain was deemed by our fathers such an offense that they assigned it to the world as one of the causes which impelled them to declare their independence. Civil liberty and this kind of martial law can not endure together; the antagonism is irreconcilable; and, in the conflict, one or the other must perish.

This Nation, as experience has proved, can not always remain at peace, and has no right to expect that it will always have wise and humane rulers, sincerely attached to the principles of the Constitution. Wicked men, ambitious of power, with hatred of liberty and contempt of law, may fill the place once occupied by Washington and Lincoln; and if this right is conceded and the calamities of war again befall us, the dangers of human liberty are frightful to contemplate. If our fathers had failed to provide for just such a contingency, they would have been false to the trust reposed in them. They knew—the history of the world told them—the Nation they were founding, be its existence short or long, would be involved in war; how often or how long continued human foresight could not tell; and that unlimited power, wherever lodged at such a time, was especially hazardous to freemen. For this, and other equally weighty reasons, they secured the inheritance they had fought to maintain, by incorporating in a written Constitution the safeguards which time had proved were essential to its preservation. Not one of these safeguards can the President or Congress or the judiciary disturb, except the one concerning the writ of habeas corpus.

It is essential to the safety of every government that, in a great crisis like the one we have just passed through, there should be a power somewhere of suspending the writ of habeas corpus. In every war there are men of previously good character wicked enough to counsel their fellow citizens to resist the measures deemed necessary by a good government to sustain its just authority and overthrow its enemies; and their influence may lead to dangerous combinations. In the emergency of the times an immediate public investigation according to law may not be possible; and yet the peril of the country may be too imminent to suffer such persons to go at large. Unquestionably there is then an exigency which demands that the Government, if it should see fit in the exercise of a proper discretion to make arrests, should not be required to produce the persons arrested in answer to a writ of habeas corpus. The Constitution goes no further. It does not say after a writ of habeas corpus is denied a citizen that he shall be tried otherwise than by the course of the common law; if it had intended this result, it was easy by the use of direct words to have accomplished it. The illustrious men who framed that instrument were guarding the foundations of civil liberty against the abuses of unlimited power; they were full of wisdom, and the lessons of history informed them that a trial by an established court, assisted by an impartial jury, was the only sure way of protecting the citizens against oppression and wrong. Knowing this, they limited the suspension to one great right and left the rest to remain forever inviolable. But it is insisted that the safety of the country in time of war demands that this broad claim for martial law shall be sustained. If this were true, it could be well said that a country, preserved at the sacrifice of all the cardinal principles of liberty, is not worth the cost of preservation. Happily it is not so.

It will be borne in mind that this is not a question of the power to proclaim martial law when war exists in a community and the courts and civil authorities are overthrown. Nor is it a question what rule a military commander, at the head of his army, can impose on States in rebellion to cripple their resources and quell the insurrection. The jurisdiction claimed is much more extensive. The necessities of the service during the late Rebellion required that the loyal States should be placed within the limits of certain military districts and commanders appointed in them; and it is urged that this, in a military sense, constituted them the theater of military operations; and, as in this case, Indiana had been and was again threatened with invasion by the enemy, the occasion was furnished to establish martial law. The conclusion does not follow from the premises. If armies were collected in Indiana, they were to be employed in another locality, where the laws were obstructed and the national authority disputed. On her soil there was no hostile foot; if once invaded, that invasion was at an end, and with it all pretext for martial law. Martial law can not arise from a threatened invasion. The necessity must be actual and present, the invasion real, such as effectually closes the courts and deposes the civil administration.

It is difficult to see how the safety of the country required martial law in Indiana. If any of her citizens were plotting treason, the power of arrest could secure them until the Government was prepared for their trial, when the courts were open and ready to try them. It was as easy to protect witnesses before a civil as a military tribunal; and as there could be no wish to convict, except on sufficient legal evidence, surely an ordained and established court was better able to judge of this than a military tribunal composed of gentlemen not trained to the profession of the law.

It follows, from what has been said on this subject, that there are occasions when martial rule can be properly applied. If, in foreign invasion or civil war, the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theater of active military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority, thus overthrown, to preserve the safety of the army and society; and as no power is left but the military, it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course. As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration; for, if this government is continued after the courts are reinstated, it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open, and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war. Because during the late Rebellion it could have been enforced in Virginia where the national authority was overturned and the courts driven out, it does not follow that it should obtain in Indiana where that authority was never disputed and justice was always administered. And so in the case of a foreign invasion, martial rule may become a necessity in one State when in another it would be "mere lawless violence."

We are not without precedents in English and American history illustrating our views of this question, but it is hardly necessary to make particular reference to them.

From the first year of the reign of Edward the Third, when the Parliament of England reversed the attainder of the Earl of Lancaster because he could have been tried by the courts of the realm, and declared, "that in time of peace no man ought to be adjudged to death for treason or any other offense without being arraigned and held to answer, and that regularly when the king's courts are open it is a time of peace in judgment of law," down to the present day martial law, as claimed in this case, has been condemned by all respectable English jurists as contrary to the fundamental laws of the land and subversive of the liberty of the subject.

During the present century an instructive debate on this question occurred in Parliament, occasioned by the trial and conviction by court-martial at Demerara of the Rev. John Smith, a missionary to the negroes, on the alleged ground of aiding and abetting a formidable rebellion in that colony. Those eminent statesmen, Lord Brougham and Sir James Mackintosh, participated in that debate and denounced the trial as illegal, because it did not appear that the courts of law in Demerara could not try offenses, and that "when the laws can act every other mode of punishing supposed crimes is itself an enormous crime."

So sensitive were our revolutionary fathers on this subject, although Boston was almost in a state of siege, when Gen. Gage issued his proclamation of martial law they spoke of its as an "attempt to supersede the course of the common law, and instead thereof to publish and order the use of martial law." The Virginia Assembly also denounced a similar measure on the part of Gov. Dunmore "as an assumed power, which the king himself can not exercise, because it annuls the law of the land and introduces the most execrable of all systems, martial law."

In some parts of the country, during the war of 1812, our officers made arbitrary arrests and by military tribunals tried citizens who were not in the military service. These arrests and trials, when brought to the notice of the courts, were uniformly condemned as illegal. The cases of Smith v. Shaw and McConnell v. Hampden (reported in 12 Johnson, pp. 257 and 234), are illustrations which we cite not only for the principles they determine, but on account of the distinguished jurists concerned in the decisions, one of whom for many years occupied a seat on this bench.

It is contended that Luther v. Borden, decided by this court, is an authority for the claim of martial law advanced in this case. The decision is misapprehended. That case grew out of the attempt in Rhode Island to supersede the old colonial government by a revolutionary proceeding. Rhode Island, until that period, had no other form of local government than the charter granted by King Charles II in 1663, and as that limited the right of suffrage and did not provide for its own amendment, many citizens became dissatisfied because the legislature would not afford the relief in their power, and without the authority of law formed a new and independent constitution and proceeded to assert its authority by force of arms. The old government resisted this and as the rebellion was formidable called out the militia to subdue it and passed an act declaring martial law. Borden, in the military service of the old government, broke open the house of Luther, who supported the new, in order to arrest him. Luther brought suit against Borden, and the question was whether, under the constitution and laws of the State, Borden was justified. This court held that a State "may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection too strong to be controlled by the civil authority," and if the legislature of Rhode Island thought the peril so great as to require the use of its military forces and the declaration of martial law there was no ground on which this court could question its authority, and as Borden acted under military orders of the charter government, which had been recognized by the political power of the country and was upheld by the State judiciary, he was justified in breaking into and entering Luther's house. This is the extent of the decision. There was no question in issue about the power of declaring martial law under the Federal Constitution, and the court did not consider it necessary even to inquire "to what extent nor under what circumstances that power may be exercised by a State."

We do not deem it important to examine further the adjudged cases, and shall, therefore, conclude without any additional reference to authorities.

To the third question, then, on which the judges below were opposed in opinion, an answer in the negative must be returned.

It is proper to say, although Milligan's trial and conviction by a military commission was illegal, yet if guilty of the crimes imputed to him, and his guilt had been ascertained by an established court and impartial jury, he deserved severe punishment. Open resistance to the measures deemed necessary to subdue a great rebellion by those who enjoy the protection of government and have not the excuse even of prejudice of section to plead in their favor is wicked, but that resistance becomes an enormous crime when it assumes the form of a secret political organization armed to oppose the laws and seeks by stealthy means to introduce the enemies of the country into peaceful communities, there to light the torch of civil war and thus overthrow the power of the United States. Conspiracies like these at such a juncture are extremely perilous, and those concerned in them are dangerous enemies to their country and should receive the heaviest penalties of the law as an example to deter others from similar criminal conduct. It is said the severity of the laws caused them; but Congress was obliged to enact severe laws to meet the crisis, and as our highest civil duty is to serve our country when in danger, the late war has proved that rigorous laws when necessary will be cheerfully obeyed by a patriotic people struggling to preserve the rich blessings of a free government.

The two remaining questions in this case must be answered in the affirmative. The suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus does not suspend the writ itself. The writ issues as a matter of course, and on the return made to it the court decides whether the party applying is denied the right of proceeding any further with it.

If the military trial of Milligan was contrary to law, then he was entitled, on the facts stated in his petition, to be discharged from custody by the terms of the act of Congress of March 3, 1863. The provisions of this law having been considered in a previous part of this opinion, we will not restate the views there presented. Milligan avers he was a citizen of Indiana, not in the military or naval service, and was detained in close confinement, by order of the President, from the 5th day of October, 1864, until the 2d day of January, 1865, when the Circuit Court for the District of Indiana, with a grand jury, convened in session at Indianapolis; and afterwards, on the 27th day of the same month, adjourned without finding an indictment or presentment against him. If these averments were true (and their truth is conceded for the purposes of this case), the court was required to liberate him on taking certain oaths prescribed by the law, and entering into recognizance for his good behavior.

But it is insisted that Milligan was a prisoner of war, and, therefore, excluded from the privileges of the statute. It is not easy to see how he can be treated as a prisoner of war, when he lived in Indiana for the past 20 years, was arrested there, and had not been, during the late troubles, a resident of any of the States in rebellion. If in Indiana he conspired with bad men to assist the enemy, he is punishable for it in the courts of Indiana; but, when tried for the offense, he can not plead the rights of war, for he was not engaged in legal acts of hostility against the Government, and only such persons, when captured, are prisoners of war. If he can not enjoy the immunities attaching to the character of a prisoner of war, how can he be subject to their pains and penalties?

This case, as well as the kindred cases of Bowles and Horsey, were disposed of at the last term, and the proper orders were entered of record. There is, therefore, no additional entry required.

RECOMMISSIONING OF FORMER OFFICERS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2746) to authorize the recommissioning of former officers of the Regular Army, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 105) thereon.

RECENT DISTURBANCES IN EAST ST. LOUIS, ILL.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate concurrent resolution No. 10, submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] on July 14, authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to investigate the causes of the recent riots in East St. Louis. I desire to call the report to the attention of both Senators from Illinois, if they are present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make any motion with respect to the resolution?

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply desire to make a favorable report on the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. The only thing in order now is to report the resolution, and, of course, it goes to the calendar until later. Is not that true? The Senator, I understand, merely makes a report from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquired of the Senator from Kansas whether he desired to make any motion with respect to the resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON. I submitted the report and called the attention of the Senators from Illinois to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Illinois will not press that request at present. I shall have no opposition to the request when presented appropriately, but during the morning hour and while morning business is being transacted I do not think we ought to go into anything else. Furthermore, I have a report from the Post Office Committee, for which I have been instructed by the committee to ask the consideration of the Senate and which, I think, ought to be considered this morning on its merits.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know of any time when we can take up the resolution and consider it unless it be in the morning hour. The revenue bill will occupy the other time of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall not object to the Senator's request if he desires to press it now, but does not the Senator think that it would probably be better to let us finish the morning business, at least, before he makes the request?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to displace any of the morning business. I do not think, however, the resolution will occupy much time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the request of the Senator would be perfectly appropriate at any time during the morning hour after the conclusion of the routine morning business, but Senators who are waiting to introduce bills and present reports ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to take up the resolution after the regular order of morning business has been concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go to the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, I was out of the Chamber a moment ago when the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] reported a resolution in reference to the East St. Louis trouble. I desire to say that a minority of the committee——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the resolution has gone to the calendar, if the Senator will pardon me, and discussion of it is not in order until the morning business has been concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, I merely wanted to explain——

Mr. HARDWICK. I call for the regular order, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not quite sure, but I think the point of order of the Senator from Georgia is not well taken. I think I have the right to make a minority report at any time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not know that that was his purpose. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to say that a minority of the committee disagreed with the views of the majority, and I desire a reasonable amount of time in which to file a minority report.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will pardon me for my observation. I misunderstood him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee requests consent to file a minority report on the resolution which has just gone to the calendar. Without objection, the request is granted.

AIRCRAFT BOARD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 2705) to create the air board and provide for its maintenance, and I submit a report (No. 106) thereon.

I wish to say that it is hardly possible to overstate the importance of this measure or the necessity of its early passage. I ask, therefore, that the report be set out in the RECORD, in order that Senators may have an opportunity to see it. I wish to state further that at an early date I shall ask for the consideration and passage of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Texas that in reading the title of the bill the words "air board" appear to be used?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The report suggests an amendment to the title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Texas, in view of the great importance of the bill which he has just reported from the Military Affairs Committee, whether it would not be feasible to secure an agreement for its early consideration? The revenue bill is the unfinished business, and may go on, as the Senator knows and as I know, for two weeks or three weeks. The aircraft board bill is of such exceeding importance that I was wondering if the Senator did not have a plan by which it could be brought up at an early date.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have had in mind bringing it up during the morning hour on Monday or Tuesday, believing it could be passed, after Senators have had opportunity to see the report, without substantial loss of time. Such is my intention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go to the calendar, and, without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report submitted this day by Mr. SHEPPARD is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 106, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2705) to create the Aircraft Board and provide for its maintenance, beg to report it back with amendments and to recommend that it be so amended and passed.

The airplane has become an indispensable and vital weapon in modern warfare. The developments of the present world conflict have demonstrated its overwhelming importance and necessity. In recognition of these facts Congress recently appropriated six hundred and forty millions of dollars for the construction of an air fleet of unparalleled proportions. It is proposed that this fleet shall be created within a year.

This is a task of appalling magnitude. Hitherto the manufacture of air planes in this country has been conducted on an extremely limited scale. The need of a board of experts in science and business to give especial attention to the production of the necessary machines, equipments, etc., is apparent. The object of the bill under consideration is the establishment of such a board. The bill has been carefully worked out and has the approval of the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the chairman of the aircraft production committee of the Council of National Defense. It is the earnest hope of the Military Affairs Committee that the bill become a law at the earliest possible date. It will facilitate in marked degree the plans of the Government for the successful prosecution of the war.

The following letters will explain themselves:

"AUGUST 1, 1917.

"Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I am sending you herewith letters from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy relative to the attached proposed bill which it is desired to submit to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs for their approval. Let me give you the following points in relation to this draft:

"First. It does not create a new mechanism, but merely recognizes an existing organization and transfers its control from the Council of National Defense to the Secretaries of War and Navy direct.

"Second. The functions of the board are entirely industrial, having no relation whatever to the functions of the military and naval authorities controlling the questions of personnel, maintenance, service, and repair. The officers of the War and Navy Departments have complete knowledge of and are skilled in the service side of the aircraft development. They can not be expected to have intimate knowledge of the manufacture of such material or of the industrial organization necessary to secure the production of the same.

"Third. The board will be composed of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, the Chief Constructor of the Navy, and such other regular officers as may be deemed essential, also civilians of unquestioned standing in the manufacturing and business world.

"Fourth. It will be the duty of this board to effect a coordination of the aircraft design and development between the governmental departments, to encourage and bring about cooperation in matters of standardization of design and specification of material, and provide for industrial source of supply of aircraft for the governmental services.

"Fifth. The aircraft program, to be made effective in bringing aid to the allied arms, must be accomplished in a minimum of time and with a maximum of efficiency in organization of engineering, business, and manufacturing resources. The general good of the service will be best served by the creation of this joint Army, Navy, and civilian board for industrial development. It may be pointed out that the load thrown upon the Signal Corps by the new appropriation bill multiplies by 50 any previous burden administered by the existing organization. The removal of the industrial and manufacturing part of the program will still leave the increased burden of military use 20 times over that handled by the existing organization. There is no question as to the successful accomplishment of the program contemplated, provided that sufficient care is exercised in creating the organization for its achievement.

"Sixth. Because of an absence of any great governmental demand for aircraft in the past, we now find at this critical time that we must nurse an infant industry. Practically the only market for aircraft has been the United States Government. As a preliminary step, therefore, in this program, not only must existing aircraft organizations be strengthened and extended but new sources of supply must be created. We have tremendous latent resources for the accomplishment of the plans laid down, but they must be organized and coordinated.

"Seventh. A separate department of aeronautics has been under consideration in committees of the Senate and House. The need for the coordination in the production of aircraft for the various departments has been recognized. The creation of a separate department of aeronautics would seem ill advised at this time. That is, I believe, the view of both the Secretaries of War and Navy. The establishment of the 'air board' as a coordinating influence between the departments would seem the best means for meeting the imperative industrial necessities of the situation and will be supplemental to and work harmoniously with existing governmental machinery.

"I am giving you these reasons for the necessity for this bill. Should the committee desire additional information in this regard, I should be glad to appear before them at your suggestion.

"Very truly, yours.

"H. E. COFFIN,
"Chairman Aircraft Production Board."

"Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I am sending you draft of a bill for the creation of the 'air board.' You will remember that it was desired to have an amendment creating this board incorporated in the aircraft bill, but upon consultation it was decided to make no amendments to this bill in the Senate.

"The work of the aircraft production board, to be continued through the establishment of the air board, will be of invaluable service to the War and Navy Departments in the consummation of the industrial developments incident to meeting the needs of the present emergency.

"I trust that this bill may have the favorable action of your committee.

"Cordially, yours, NEWTON D. BAKER,
"Secretary."

"JULY 31, 1917.

"Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I understand that the Secretary of War has sent you a draft for a bill to continue the work of the aircraft production board through the creation of the 'air board.' Inasmuch as this board is to serve the Navy as well as the Army, I am writing to express my concurrence with the draft suggested by the Secretary of War.

"Sincerely, yours,

"JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
"Secretary."

The committee suggest the following amendments:

Change the title so as to read "To create the Aircraft Board and provide for its maintenance."

In line 7, page 1, strike out the word "Air" and insert "Aircraft."

In line 6, page 2, strike out the words "serve without" and insert the words "receive a."

In line 6, page 2, strike out the period after the word "compensation" and add the words "of $7,500 each per annum." The committee believe that it is the best policy to pay the civilian members of the board a salary in some degree commensurate with the importance of the work. As a matter of fact, most of the men in contemplation for membership on the board, men of recognized achievement and distinction in important lines of industry, either have accepted or are about to accept commissions as officers of the Army. Probably not more than one member, in addition to the chairman, will have a civilian status.

In lines 7, page 2, strike out the words "under the direction." Strike out lines 8 and 9, page 2. In line 10, page 2, strike out the words "the Departments of War and Navy." In line 11, page 2, strike out the words "respective departments" and insert the words "Departments of War and Navy, respectively." Strike out the proviso beginning in line 17, page 2, and ending in line 21.

The amendments suggested in the preceding paragraphs do not vitally change the section as it now reads, but leave the board under the supervision, direction, and approval of the Departments of War and Navy.

In line 1, page 3, strike out the words "the compensation thereof" and insert the words "their salaries. Such salaries shall conform to those usually paid by the Government for similar service: Provided, That by unanimous approval of the board higher compensation may be paid to technical experts and advisers."

This amendment is proposed as a matter of precaution and explains itself.

In line 3, page 3, add the word "office" between the words "necessary" and "equipment." In line 6, page 3, strike out the word "above" and insert the words "in this paragraph." In lines 12 and 13, page 3, strike out the words "the above purpose" and insert the words "these purposes."

These amendments make the meaning of the section clearer.

Amend further by numbering the sections of the bill properly and consecutively.

LEASE OF POTASH LANDS.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state it.

Mr. HUSTING. Before the morning business is concluded, I desire to make a motion for the reconsideration of a bill. I should like to ask the Chair whether it is in order at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not until the morning business is closed. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. HUSTING subsequently said: I should like at this time to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby Senate bill 2156 was ordered to a third reading and passed, and also a motion to reconsider, if it is proper, the several amendments that were adopted when the bill was in the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2775) fixing eight hours as the standard day's work for all lumber mills, logging camps, or other wood-working establishments whose products enter interstate commerce; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 2776) providing for the classification of lands under the stock-grazing homestead act in certain States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 2777) providing for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the first judicial circuit; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000,000 for continuing construction and enlargement of the irrigation and drainage system, increase the food supply of the country, and to make possible the utilization of the water supply provided for 40 acres of each Indian allotment on the Yakima Indian Reservation, Wash., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WAR AND PEACE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution which I ask to have read. I request that it lie upon the table, to be called up later by me, when I shall submit some observations upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 11) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Provisional Government of Russia did, on the 19th day of May, 1917, declare in favor of "peace without annexation or indemnities on the basis of the rights of nations to decide their own destiny"; and

Whereas the Imperial Reichstag, representing the great majority of the German people, did on the 19th day of July, 1917, by a vote of 214 to 116, pass resolutions in favor of peace, "without forced acquisition of territory and without political, economic, and financial violations" and declaring for "a mutual understanding and lasting reconciliation among the nations and the creation of international juridical organizations"; and

Whereas the German chancellor, speaking for the Imperial German Government on the 17th day of May, 1917, made the following official declaration in the Reichstag:

"We did not go to war, and we are not fighting now against almost the whole world, in order to make conquests, but only to secure our existence, and firmly to establish the future of the nation"; and

Whereas on behalf of Great Britain on the 23d day of May, 1917, Lord Robert Cecil, as one of the ministers of the present Government, replying in the House of Commons, declared that—

"Our aims and aspirations are dictated solely by our determination to secure a peace founded on national liberty and international amity, and that all imperialistic aims based on force and conquest are completely absent from our program"; and

Whereas duly organized bodies of loyal citizens of Great Britain, representing millions of other citizens, many of whom are eminent in official life and exert a wide influence upon public opinion, have declared that—

"A stage in the war has been reached when the democracies of all the belligerent countries are beginning to work toward a peace based on the same general principles"; and

Whereas the above principles are those by which the respective warring Governments of Europe profess common willingness to be bound and are principles to which the United States subscribes; and

Whereas one and all of these declarations bespeak a willingness to adopt the doctrine of "a peace without victory," proclaimed by President Wilson on the 22d day of January, 1917, as the only possible peace that can be enduring; and

Whereas there has recently emanated from official and unofficial sources, both in this country and abroad, statements indicating that we are to continue in the war until a peace is obtained which gives to the entente allies, or some of them, punitive damages and territorial advantages as a result of the war; and

Whereas the people of this country do not know the terms of the secret treaties or agreements existing among the entente allies defining the advantages, if any, either in the way of indemnities or territorial acquisitions or commercial privileges, which each is expected to receive as a result of the war; and

Whereas there is naturally a widely expressed demand coming from the people of our own country for some declaration of the purpose and object for which the United States is expending, in the first year of the war, from thirteen to seventeen billions of money, and raising by draft and otherwise an army of 2,000,000 men ostensibly for service in foreign countries; and

Whereas the people have a right to know with certainty for what end their blood is to be shed and their treasure expended; and

Whereas in this free Government Congress, in whom the war-making power resides under the Constitution, is charged primarily with the responsibility of deciding upon the objects of the war at its commencement or at any time during its existence: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Constitution vests in the Congress as the accredited and lawful representatives of the people full authority to determine and to declare definitely the objects and purposes for which this Government shall continue to participate in the European war.

Resolved further, That the Congress hereby declares that this Government will not contribute to the efforts of any belligerent for the purpose of prolonging the war to annex new territory, either in Europe or outside of Europe, nor to enforce the payment of indemnities to recover the expenses of the war; but the Congress does hereby declare in favor of the creation of a common fund to be provided by all the belligerent nations to assist in the restoration of the portions of territory in any of the countries most seriously devastated by the war, and for the establishment of an international commission to decide the allotment of the common fund.

Resolved further, That Congress declares that there should be a public restatement of the allied peace terms, based on a disavowal of any advantages, either in the way of indemnities, territorial acquisitions, commercial privileges, or economic prerogatives, by means of which one nation shall strengthen its power abroad at the expense of another nation, as wholly incompatible with the establishment of a durable peace in the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, unless the motion already has been made, I move that the concurrent resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asked that the concurrent resolution lie on the table, to be called up by him at some future time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. KING. I offer a resolution which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and lie on the table. I offer this resolution in view of the untimely talk of peace when Germany's conduct evinces a continuation of her ruthless warfare against our Nation as well as our allies, and I also offer it in view of the resolution submitted by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

The resolution (S. Res. 114) is as follows:

Whereas the Imperial Government of Germany, in pursuit of a policy to extend its territorial domains and imperial power by use of military force, organized the German people into an army for aggressions and trespasses against other nations; and

Whereas in July, 1914, Germany, in alliance with Austria made an armed trespass upon the sovereignty and territory of Serbia; and

Whereas Germany, without cause and in perfidious violation of its treaties and in contravention of international law and the rights of nations forced an entrance by military violence into Belgium, and in aggravation of, and in pursuit of such trespass, made war upon Belgium and her unoffending inhabitants, murdered and enslaved noncombatant men women, and children, extorted fines and money, and has, with unexampled barbarity and cruelty, burned and destroyed villages churches, public edifices, homes, and property; and

Whereas Germany invaded France and extended to the cities within the zone of military occupation, the same cruelties, extortions, and atrocities which have been and are practiced in Belgium; and

Whereas Germany has occupied Poland, Serbia, Montenegro, Courland, and parts of Roumania by military force and without the consent of the nations severally inhabiting said countries, and has driven the civil population of said countries from their homes and possessions; and

Whereas Germany has provoked and prompted the extermination and massacre of the Christian population of Armenia and Asia Minor at the hands of the Turks; and

Whereas Germany has determined upon the wanton destruction of the world's shipping in order to reduce the maritime commerce of other nations, and in pursuit of this policy has ruthlessly murdered noncombatant men, women, and children in violation of the law of nations, the rights of neutrals, and the rules of war as acknowledged and practiced by enlightened and civilized States; and

Whereas Germany has without warrant of law placed mines in the public waters of the high seas and has constructed and commissioned submarines to destroy neutral and merchant shipping and has willfully taken the lives of innocent and noncombatant passengers upon hospital ships and upon neutral ships conveying food for the succor of the starving people in Belgium and in other countries under the unlawful military occupation of Germany; and

Whereas Germany has wantonly destroyed American ships and taken the lives of American citizens contrary to the law of nations and of treaties subsisting between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany, as successor to the Kingdom of Prussia; and

Whereas Germany has abused the comity and dignity of the United States in time of peace by maintaining spies and depredatory agents who have intrigued and plotted against the peace and security of the country by planning to destroy industrial plants and factories and to promote sedition and insurrection; and

Whereas the German Government has intrigued and attempted to induce Mexico to make war against the United States and has intrigued and attempted to bring on a state of war between the United States and Japan; and

Whereas Germany has condemned the international policy of the United States, and particularly the Monroe doctrine, by which the United States has prevented the trespass of autocratic and imperial Governments against the free Republics of America; and

Whereas it is the policy of the German Government to extend its imperial system to America, and for this purpose to subvert by force the principles of liberty and to subject the free inhabitants of America to its imperial dominion in contravention and contempt of the rights of America and of the international policy of the United States; and

Whereas Germany has not acknowledged her belligerent trespasses against the United States and the property and lives of her citizens, but avows her intention to continue such trespasses and violations of the law of nations; and

Whereas Germany, by her national acts of murder, piracy, arson, and perfidy has made herself an outlaw among the nations and is unwilling to submit herself to the law of nations and to the humane principles and customs of enlightened States, but avows her intention to impose her will by force upon the world; and

Whereas Germany, in her international relations, considers solely her own ends and aggrandizement, without regard to the equal rights of other States, and is unwilling to be governed by the law which recognizes the equal dignity and rights of all States, but rather seeks to be a law unto herself; and

Whereas the German Imperial Government made war upon the United States without cause, justification, or excuse, and in violation of the law of nations and of the rights of the Government and the people of the United States and in contravention of and in violation of treaties subsisting between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany; and

Whereas the belligerent acts of Germany have been and are directed against the vital interests and honor of the United States and the principles of humanity and liberty to which they are irrevocably committed: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Government of the United States will not make peace until its purposes and principles as declared by the President in his address to Congress of the 2d of April shall have been acknowledged and accomplished; and that for this cause the Government of the United States will wage war and employ its military, moral, and economic resources until German trespasses against American rights have been suppressed and the honor and sovereignty of America shall have been vindicated, and until the German Government shall have acknowledged and expiated its crimes and shall seek the terms upon which it may be admitted to the community of the civilized and enlightened States, which have made common cause to vindicate the rights of nations and secure the blessings of justice and civilization, and for these purposes, to establish and maintain the peace of the world.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. MYERS. I offer a concurrent resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 12.

Whereas the people and the Government of the United States are now engaged in the greatest war of history, which, in its determination, is fraught with great results for good or evil, not only to the people of this country but to the people of the whole world, and which is the greatest undertaking upon which this country has ever embarked; and

Whereas this country is about to engage in preparing for war and will soon be sending abroad to the theater of war great numbers of our young men, there to take part in the sanguinary conflict and offer their lives in defense of their country's rights; and

Whereas it is in accordance with the customs and traditions of this country, as a Christian Nation, and has heretofore been the practice of this country upon engaging in war, to set aside a day by official proclamation for prayer for the aid of the Almighty: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is, requested by Congress to issue a proclamation designating a day of prayer and calling upon the people of this country on such day to assemble in their various places of worship and there offer prayer to Almighty God for the success of our armies and victory for our cause in this great conflict.

MOTOR-TRUCK DELIVERY.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2718, which I ask the Secretary to report to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2718) to authorize experiments in motor-truck delivery.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the bill which the Senate has just agreed to consider is one that I believe can and will and ought to be passed by the Senate without a dissenting vote. The bill provides:

That to promote the conservation of food products and to facilitate the collection and delivery thereof from producer to consumer the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to conduct experiments in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities of the United States as he may select, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and the cost of such experiments may be paid by the Postmaster General out of any of the unexpended funds of the Postal Service; and the Postmaster General shall report the result of such experiments to Congress at the earliest practicable date.

The Senate will recall that when the Congress of the United States established the Rural Delivery Service it did so after experimentation in that service very much along the lines proposed here. The proposal will cost, so the department advises me, something like $100,000; but the funds of the Post Office Department are ample, and no special or particular appropriation is asked or is needed for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from what fund the $100,000 could be taken?

Mr. HARDWICK. The bill expressly provides that it may be taken from any of the unexpended funds of the Postal Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I noticed that, Mr. President. That is the provision in the bill. I will say to the Senator that that is a very unsatisfactory way of making an appropriation, and in the past it has always been objected to. Of course, in these days we are doing a great many things that we would not have done in the past. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows from what fund this money will be paid?

Mr. HARDWICK. It will be paid, of course, if the bill passes in this form, from any funds at the disposal of the Post Office Department, coming from any source. In other words, it is a general charge upon the postal funds. I want to say to the Senator that, of course, I realize the force of the objection he makes, and if he insists upon any amendment along that line I will gladly accede to it; but I do think that when we remember the tendency of all Postmasters General, and when we remember the tendency of the particular Postmaster General in office now, to try to make a good showing on the balance sheet, we need not be uneasy about his spending any more money than is required for this experiment out of his general funds.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I would prefer to have a direct appropriation for this particular service. I recognize, of course, the fact that in that case it, perhaps, ought to originate in the House, although I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; there is no reason in the law or in the Constitution why it should originate there.

Mr. SMOOT. As I say, I do not think it is necessary; but I will say to the Senator right now that I should very much prefer to appropriate $100,000 now for this purpose than to take it out of any of the unexpended balances.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, the way to do that is to fix the amount not to exceed that much as an amendment, and I will accept that if the Senator will present it at the proper time. The department assures me that it will have ample money from this source to do whatever is experimentally necessary. So to accomplish the purpose the Senator has in mind if he will say down in line 9, such experiments to cost not to exceed that amount, I think it will really accomplish the object. If the Senator on reflection wants to propose that amendment, I say to him in advance I shall be willing to accept it; but let us go on.

I want to get through with this measure. I earnestly hope no Senator will be opposed to it. It seems to me that whatever may be any Senator's view about governmental participation in business activities and whatever objection any Senator might have upon that ground and for that reason to a very large or very general parcel-post system throughout the country, no Senator of the United States ought to occupy that position in relation to a rural parcel-post service, because the mail facilities of the country already extend into the rural sections of the country, and no express service or other parcel-post service, other than the mail service or something connected with it and operated by the Post Office Department, can possibly afford people of the rural communities the facilities that people of the cities and towns have through the express companies.

It is my opinion, and it is the opinion of the Post Office Department, that one of the most important ways of reducing the cost of living in these great centers of population is to bring the country people who live within a radius, say, of 100 miles around these cities in more direct and in cheaper communication with the people in these great cities, who are suffering from the high prices. Personally I believe that such a movement as that, practical as it is, is more likely to accomplish something of real importance than anything you will likely get out of the so-called food-control bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it the idea that the experiment will be made in the nature of carrying produce from the farms under parcel-post rates?

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. To consumers in the cities?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am coming to that right now, if the Senator pleases, and I will hurry, because other Senators have other business to bring before the Senate.

It is proposed that the Postmaster General shall be authorized to experiment around a number of cities in the establishment of these motor-truck deliveries, so as to bring the farmers and the people who are growing vegetables and produce for the city markets in direct and immediate communication with their customers in the cities and provide cheaper and more efficient means of communication between them. The Postmaster General would be authorized to experiment with this thing, to decide how long these routes ought to be, and exactly where, and in what manner they ought to operate and what the cost ought to be, experimentally, and he is required to report to Congress.

The department hopes to make its report at the beginning of the next session, or soon thereafter, so that some general system of this sort may be inaugurated around cities of any size in this country under rules and regulations prescribed by the Congress of the United States.

But, of course, we must begin experimentally if we are to establish this service. This matter was referred, when the bill was introduced, to the Post Office Department by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and on August 6, 1917, the Postmaster General directed this letter to the chairman of the committee:

AUGUST 6, 1917.

Hon. J. H. BANKHEAD,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: In answer to your inquiry of the 3d instant, requesting an expression of opinion regarding the merits of Senate bill 2718, to authorize experiments in motor-truck delivery, I beg to state that I am firmly in the belief that this proposed legislation, if enacted into law, would provide an important factor in the solution of the problem of reducing the cost of living, since it will supply the means of providing direct communication and conveyance between producers and consumers in localities where there is great need for improved transportation facilities.

It is of immediate importance that legislation, such as is proposed in the bill under discussion, be enacted for the relief of the numerous rural communities throughout the country where the population through the patriotic adoption of the measures advocated by the President increased food production and where a failure may result because of insufficient facilities for communication with or direct conveyance to the nearest available market.

The apparent purpose of this bill is to arrange for the coordination of the good roads which have been constructed throughout the country, the improved type of motor vehicle, and the parcel-post feature of the postal activity in such manner as will result in the maximum of advantage to the taxpayer.

There is no doubt that this legislation will increase the postal revenue and afford a wider field of utility of the parcel-post privilege, which up to this time had been used to a very limited extent by the postal patrons residing in rural territory. The records indicate that only about eight pieces per route per day—are carried from the city to rural patrons, and about one piece per route per day is transported from the rural districts to the cities. When this legislation shall have been enacted, because of the direct communication and transportation facilities thereby provided between producer and consumer, any route that may be established under its provisions may reasonably be expected to transport at least 1,000 pounds each way per day, and at the present local-zone rate on parcel post this would produce a revenue of not less than $10, which would approximately meet the expenditure for the daily operation of a route 100 miles in length.

Taking the United States as a whole, I interpolate—

In my opinion this proposed legislation is highly meritorious, and I strongly urge its early and favorable consideration.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Now, only one more word, and then I will be ready, as far as I am concerned, for the Senate to vote on this proposition, because I know it will understand its merits. It was inadvisable, in my judgment, although the proposition was first submitted to me by the department in that form, to connect this parcel-post matter with the rural mail going out of the city, because the suburban mails around all the cities of the country are heavy and are considerable in volume, and that mail, which is one of the utmost importance to business men residing in suburban districts in the vicinity of great cities, would be slowed down and the service would be ruined or badly impaired if this other service were connected with it. Therefore we have undertaken to entirely separate the two and to provide a parcel-post service in these matters entirely disconnected from and without any relation to the existing mail facilities of the cities, except that it is to be operated by the Post Office Department.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Georgia if he understands that this service is only to be continued until a report is made to Congress next winter?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all. This is a proposition to conduct an experiment. The Postmaster General will make a report to Congress at the earliest practicable moment.

If the Senator will pardon me a minute, at one time I thought I would require a report at the beginning of the session of Congress, but that is a very short time in which to make any experiment of any importance. So I put it at the earliest practicable date, but it is the clear understanding of the department that at the earliest practicable moment, as soon as they can intelligently present this information to the Congress, they are to do so, and they have every desire and every purpose to do so.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator if the report will be made during the session next winter?

Mr. HARDWICK. I know it will; that is to say, the department officials assured me that it was only a matter of a few months. I think they have been dealing absolutely candidly and openly with Congress about this matter, and they really want to try this experiment and are anxious to report the result of their labors to Congress at the earliest practicable moment when they proceed far enough to make an intelligent report.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question? Over a year ago there was an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill providing for certain experiments looking to the extension of the Parcel Post Service in order to permit direct dealing between producers and consumers.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was on very much the same line as the idea of this bill. It was offered by the Senator from Florida. I remember it. I think I was temporarily in charge of the Post Office appropriation bill, and I accepted it and retained it in conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is correct about that. I wish to inquire what progress has been made in that examination?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the Senator very frankly that I do not know. Some friction has arisen, as the Senator himself knows, between the Department of Agriculture and the Post Office Department about its operation. That is one of the very reasons why this proposition is advanced. I wish the Senator's proposition had been carried out. I was very much for it, as he knows.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the experiment would have been very valuable.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with this matter does not the Senator think it would be well if the experiment should be carried on really during the winter so as to get the experience not only of the summer and fall but also in winter?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it ought to be conducted for some little period of time, and there is every disposition on the part of the department to lay before Congress the results of their investigation and to report fully on these matters as soon as they can.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I made that suggestion because my first impression was that we should have an early report, but I do not believe now that we ought.

Mr. HARDWICK. If we pass the bill, as we hope to, in the next few days in both Houses of Congress, the department can experiment at once in the fall weather and then to some extent in the winter weather in various sections of the country and get a good idea as to how the system will work.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it ought to be understood really that Congress desires that this experiment shall be carried on not only during the fall with the conditions then existing but also during the winter so that the department report may be based upon normal conditions at different seasons.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that is the intention; and it must be done that way because the winter is rapidly approaching, as the Senator knows, although it does not feel like it now.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish that I could at once agree with the Senator from Georgia in regard to the importance of the bill and in regard to the policy underlying the bill, because I think he is entirely sincere and earnest in the advocacy of the measure and the policy. But, Mr. President, there is a principle involved here to which I can not quite agree. It is a short bill—an innocent-looking bill—and on its face the design is a public good, a public benefit, and because of that I know it at first blush will appeal to many. It appealed to me in a way when the matter was before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I said that I would not object to reporting the bill, although I could not then vote that it be reported favorably. But the bill proposes a questionable experiment. The experiment is this, that the Government shall go into the general business of transporting food products from the truck farms in the country districts to the cities. It has no relation, of course, although perhaps that system suggested it, to the rural mail delivery or to the parcel post. It is altogether a different system.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, they are doing exactly the thing proposed on the rural routes, under the law now.

Mr. STERLING. I know, but it has no relation whatever to mail and the Parcel Post Service proper. The bill provides for the collection and delivery of these products from producers to consumers. I wonder if the activities of the Government will cease with that! The next step will be the carrying of the products and articles from the stores in the cities to the farmers, and the Government will be engaged in an exchange business between the producer on the truck farm and the merchant in the city. The proposed experiment resolves itself into this, and the very next demand will be, even if it is not involved in this measure, that the Government shall act as a huckster of merchandise.

In the old days out in the neighborhood of the farm in Illinois 20 miles from the county seat town there was the man who went through the country and gathered up a wagonload of eggs, poultry, and butter, and carried them to the town and then carried from the town the sugar, coffee, and other articles from the grocery and dry-goods stores and peddled them out among the farmers. He was called the huckster. That in effect is the system we shall establish if the principle of this bill is carried out to its logical consequences.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Even if it be granted that that is true, did not the Senator vote for a bill a few days ago which provided for the sale of potatoes and other things by the Government?

Mr. STERLING. That bill involved a great many other things, I will say to the Senator from Georgia—a great many provisions I was in favor of, and because of those and not because of some objectionable features—and there were several of them—that I voted for the food-control bill. But this is a proposition standing alone and is not complicated with anything else at all.

Mr. President, the report of the Postmaster General may be said to be a report dealing in glittering generalities rather than in facts. He does not in this report point to any particular conditions existing anywhere in the country or in the neighborhood of great cities as they relate to transportation of truck food products. He says:

> I beg to state that I am firmly in the belief that this proposed legislation, if enacted into law, would provide an important factor in the solution of the problem of reducing the cost of living, since it will supply the means of providing direct communication and conveyance between producers and consumers in localities where there is great need for improved transportation facilities.

Mr. President, the Postmaster General assumes in a very general sort of a way that there is a lack of transportation facilities, either transportation facilities owned by the producer himself on his truck farm or transportation facilities afforded by regular and interurban railroads. I do not think there is good basis for such an assumption. There must now be an abundance of facilities either owned by the producer or otherwise ready for his use, and there is no need now that the Government should go into the business of furnishing these facilities in order that the truck farmer may get his produce to the market or in order that such farmer in turn may get from the merchant in the city what he needs in the way of supplies, groceries, or dry goods at reasonable cost.

Mr. President, we know there have been some hindrances in the matter of transportation; that there has been or was for a time a lack of adequate transportation facilities for coal, for corn, for wheat, and perhaps other products; but that was rather a lack of transportation facilities between the towns or cities of the interior and the great terminal markets, so far as food products are concerned. I think the Senator from Georgia has not heard—as I have not heard—of any lack of transportation facilities for the man engaged in raising truck and sending it to the city. The proposition is that the Government shall go out and take in a radius within a hundred miles of the city and haul the stuff to the market. Within a hundred miles, and in all directions, there will be hundreds of truck farms that have their own conveyances or means of transportation. Is it intended that they shall sell or dispose of these now that the Government is going into the business of transportation from the truck farm to the market? Within the 100-mile limit, of course, a large proportion will have easy access to the railroads, and I see no use of the Government going into this enterprise at the present time.

We have already gone a long way in this direction.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me for just one minute?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to get the argument upon the proper basis. There are some expressions possibly in the report of the Postmaster General that may have led the Senator into one error. We are not discussing this system as a policy. The main purpose of the proposed legislation is to experiment. We want to see what it ought to be, and how it ought to be, and how it ought to operate; and even if the Senator entertains some of the views which he has expressed, there is no reason why this system can not be operated without impinging upon those views. This is a mere proposal to experiment along this line and ascertain how it ought to be done and how it can best be done.

Mr. STERLING. The view of the Senator from South Dakota is that there is no demand for the experiment being tried, and that we are proposing to undertake here something which involves a dangerous principle. The Senator from Georgia must know that the principle embodied in this bill is socialism.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will say that it is not a bit more so than was the parcel-post proposition in its entirety.

Mr. STERLING. It is more so——

Mr. HARDWICK. The post office is a carrier for hire.

Mr. STERLING. Because the articles which are carried or which may be carried in the parcel post may be carried by the same conveyances and by the same means of transportation as the mail is carried. This is a different proposition. It involves the Government in altogether a new enterprise, for which it must provide the facilities.

I think, Mr. President, that this matter should be very carefully considered before the Senate acts upon it. I had hoped that the Senator from Georgia would give the Senate an opportunity to further study this bill, especially with reference to the principle involved, before bringing it up for action at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I listened very intently to the argument which was just made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and many of the arguments which he advanced against this measure presented added inducements to me in its favor. If this bill will hasten the day when the Government itself will direct and control transportation, I shall very gladly vote for it.

The bill, however, as I understand it, means only that experiments shall be undertaken to determine various routes and to lessen the cost of transportation between communities of production and communities of consumption. It was asked of the Senator from South Dakota if he had not just voted and spoken for a law most drastic in character and effect and actually doing those things the very suggestion of one of which in the pending measure causes him alarm. I heard the remark made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], when the Senator from South Dakota was asked that question, that the particular measure, the food bill, was a war measure, adopted during the progress of the war and for the war alone; but permit me to suggest, Mr. President, that if it be found efficacious in time of war that a single man shall administer matters respecting food, if that administration shall be beneficent and if it shall succeed in bringing unto the people of this Nation food for less prices than they are now paying, if it solve at all the pressing question of high prices, you may rest assured that that kind of legislation and that sort of administration will be not only for the war but will be for peace, too, in our land. These excursions that have been made of late by us in centralization and absolutism, and particularly that which we have done in the last few weeks in our country and in our legislative branch of the Government, wherein finally we have concentrated in one man and in one power the right and the authority to deal with almost every human activity and almost everything in our lives and in our daily routine—if that sort of thing be found to be during time of war of benefit unto all the people of this Nation, if it cheapens food and enables the ordinary people to have coal and fuel, if it lightens the burden of the many and brings to them a little more of life's pleasures and a bit more of happiness, whether it be termed socialism or in any other fashion that Senators do not like, you may be certain, sir, that when war is concluded that sort of thing will be held to by our people because of the benefits it has conferred. We are upon new and untrod paths, and only the demonstration whether they bring us good or ill will determine what governmentally our course will be in the future.

That this may be, as designated by the Senator from South Dakota, an essay into socialism does not trouble me in the slightest degree. If the Post Office Department by an essay into socialism may bring producer and consumer more closely together, if it may in very small degree solve the problem that is now confronting our people, if it may lessen excessive prices and strike at extortion, if that which happens between producer and consumer, where we find necessities trafficked in and outrageous prices charged, may be even in small degree eliminated, let us go on with this sort of essay in socialism.

So I am very glad to vote for this particular measure, experimental as it is, and to make the effort that something may be done in the direction that it tends.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am going to suggest an amendment to this bill that the experiment shall end with the end of the fiscal year 1918.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield to me, I will state to him that so far as I have power to do so I will accept such an amendment. It is not desired that the experiment shall run longer than that time. Such an amendment as the Senator suggests is all right.

Mr. WEEKS. I am not going to make serious objection to this legislation, although I hesitate about undertaking experimentation work of this kind which is not going to have some terminal. We are quite apt to undertake an experiment and then, through the pressure which comes, to continue that work after the days of experiment shall have been concluded. The arguments in behalf of this measure are not very remote in character from the arguments that were advanced when the Rural Delivery Service was established; and I refer particularly to the financial results. At the time we started the Rural Delivery Service it was based upon paying the carriers $450 a year, and we have gotten up to paying them $1,200 a year. Every condition that now surrounds that service is different from the condition which was held out to Congress when it was undertaken.

We have recently, within four or five years, established the Parcel Post System. One of the main arguments in favor of the establishment of that system was that advanced by the representatives of the farmers, to the effect that it would enable the farmers to get in direct communication with their customers in the urban communities. I am frank to say that while I did not have overoptimistic views upon that subject, yet the hope that it would do so was one of the principal incentives which led me to support that legislation. The result is what the Postmaster General has stated to-day, and what everybody knows, that the service for that purpose is almost entirely neglected, and it is neglected because it is not practicable.

I do not take the figures which the Postmaster General has sent us relative to the cost of this service seriously at all. Does anybody mean to imply that the Government, under the peculiar red-tape system which surrounds the Government, can go out into the surrounding territory of Maryland and compete with the farmer, who can be found every night coming into the city over the main channels bringing his produce to this market? Of course the Government can not do it. Anyone following any of these main roads out of Washington at this season of the year will meet 40 or 50 market wagons containing the farmers' products which they are bringing into the market. They are bringing it in at night because they want to be ready for the market the next morning. The Government in all probability is not going to carry these products at night. The cost of maintaining this service, $10 a day, which is held out by the Postmaster General for a hundred-mile route, is simply a snare and a delusion. It can not be done. That is a less cost than the conduct of the Rural Delivery Service to-day by horse or motorcycle. If we are proposing to pass this legislation based on any such figures as those, of course we are deceiving ourselves.

But if the amendment I have indicated is included in the bill I do not wish to be put in the position of opposing any experiment that will bring the product of the farmer to his customer at any increased speed or any reduced cost over what obtains to-day. Therefore with the proposal that this service shall end with the end of the next fiscal year, so that we may then stop and take breath and actually find out what it has cost and whether it ought to be continued, I shall not oppose further the consideration of the legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am one of the inconsiderable number of Senators who voted against the food-control bill. I opposed, for reasons that were satisfactory to me, the entry of the Government upon that territory; but it has crossed the bridge; it is over in that territory. One hundred and fifty million dollars will presently be set aside as a revolving fund to facilitate the purchase of supplies not only for the Army and Navy, but any surplus that may remain for distribution among private consumers. However strenuously I may have opposed crossing the bridge into that territory, Congress has crossed it, and the President has approved the bill. The question now is not whether we will go; we have arrived; we have entered upon that domain of Government undertaking.

Whatever opposition I could have had to the entry upon that particular undertaking the time for that objection is now passed. If the use of motor trucks may make this revolving fund revolve any cheaper between producer and consumer, I am willing for the Postmaster General to make the experiment, and that is all this is. I think that it is in keeping with legislation already enacted. It is only a small undertaking to enable the Postmaster General to find out whether or not he can facilitate the operations of the food-control bill. That is what this measure is, and the Senator from Georgia has, I think, embodied the proper principle in the pending bill.

However much as a general proposition I might be opposed to the undertaking, yet, as I have said, we have undertaken it, and Senators who supported the food-control bill certainly now would stop short of the reasons that actuated them then if they refused to support this measure.

This, I repeat, is an inconsiderable matter, a very small undertaking, to say the least; and, having undertaken the larger thing, this, which is a mere incident to the main question, does not cause me to hesitate a particle. We have embarked on that undertaking, and now it seems to me that this proposition to facilitate the movement of commodities between producer and consumer is logical. It is an experiment; if it does not turn out well, we will have at best spent only a few hundred thousand dollars, and we are spending so much more than that in other directions that I am perfectly willing now to make any experiment that may tend to further the object of legislation already enacted.

Ordinarily I am opposed to such legislation altogether, but, as long as Congress has crossed over into the territory and undertaken the larger task, I suggest that we let the incident be taken as a matter of fact. I shall support the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move to strike out after the word "and," in line 9, down to and including the word "Service," on line 11, and to insert in lieu thereof "there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000"; so that it will read:

That to promote the conservation of food products and to facilitate the collection and delivery thereof from producer to consumer the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to conduct experiments in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities of the United States as he may select, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator had better add something to that. It is incomplete. The words "for the cost of such experiments," or language to that effect, should be employed in order to make it complete.

Mr. SMOOT. I will suggest that it read, "the sum of $100,000, for the cost of such experiments."

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right. I do not object to the amendment. It amounts to the same thing as the present language of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say a word. I am utterly opposed to Congress appropriating money for one purpose and then having that money used for another. That used to be a very common practice; but I think about five or six years ago it ceased. The Committee on Appropriations of both Houses of Congress took the position that no such legislation should be enacted if it could be prevented. We have adhered to that position strictly; and I think in this case, even though the amount involved is small, that we ought not to violate that principle of business which has now been established by Congress.

Mr. President, it used to be the practice of the heads of divisions and bureaus and departments to ask for more money than they actually required, with a view of using the money for some purpose other than that for which it was directly appropriated. It is for that reason that I offered this amendment, and I am glad the Senator from Georgia having the bill in charge will accept it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah be stated. I was absent from the Chamber when it was offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lines 9, 10, and 11, after the word "and," it is proposed to strike out "the cost of such experiments may be paid by the Postmaster General out of any of the unexpended funds of the Postal Service"; and insert "there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000 for the cost of such experiments."

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I approve the amendment very heartily and indorse the reasons assigned by the honorable Senator from Utah in support of it. I will say while I am on my feet that I am very much in favor of this bill. I think it would promote commercial intercourse between the countryman and the man in the town and facilitate transactions which will redound to the interest of both classes. I hope the bill will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "experiments," in line 6, the words "until the end of the fiscal year 1918."

Mr. HARDWICK. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have not considered the food-control bill which has been passed by Congress as a great war emergency act, designed to consolidate the powers of government in the hands of the Executive for the purpose of carrying out the task which Congress imposed upon him when it passed the declaration of war, to wit, to carry the war to a successful conclusion, as at all a precedent for routine legislation in this country. Of course, if the food director shall make food cheaper for the consumers, if the conditions brought about shall be favorable also to production, and if it shall turn out that by such measures as he may adopt producers prosper and the consumers prosper also, it may be that the people will insist on having a permanent food director placed over them; but that thought had never seriously entered my head until the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] optimistically suggested it this morning.

But be that as it may, the food-control bill is a sudden war emergency measure. This bill is for the purpose of appropriating a sum of money to conduct an experiment which, if shown to be possible or feasible or economical or beneficial in one or two localities selected as experiment grounds, is to be the basis for a general system to be established and continued as a permanent governmental policy in time of peace, and to that extent I think there is a clear difference between the two pieces of legislation.

It seems to me that this is a very peculiar measure. Even if I were in favor of Government ownership and operation of steam railroads, trunk lines of railroad, to do the general business of the country, I doubt if it would be possible as a general policy to have the Post Office Department buy and maintain and repair and operate enough motor trucks within a radius of 100 miles or of 15 miles, if you please, around all the cities of any size in this country to transport the products of the farms and of the country to the consumers in the cities. Why, Mr. President, it would be a Herculean task. Anybody who is at all familiar with a city like New York City, which must be approached, so far as the products of the farms are concerned, over ferryboats, can imagine the number of motor trucks and chauffeurs and garages and car cleaners that must be maintained to bring the food products daily required by the city of New York from a territory within a radius of 25 miles around New York City. Why, it is simply amazing. A thousand motor trucks operating continuously night and day would not begin to furnish the facilities for bringing into the city of New York the dairy products and the farm products required in that city daily. It would require a stupendous capital invested to equip the territory around the various cities of this country with motor trucks. They would have to be of the best make. They would be heavily loaded. They would be breaking down all the time. They would have to be of the most expensive type to stand that kind of work, and if they were not they would have to be renewed every year or two.

If this principle is correct—that it is the duty of the Government to act as middleman between the producers and the consumers and to see that every farmer has an automobile truck at his farm door when his butter and eggs and vegetables and perishable fruits are ready to ship to market—it is equally the duty of the Government to see that everybody in New York has his coal bin filled when he needs a ton of coal, and it is equally the duty of the Government to see that the various fuels are transported to the consumers in the city promptly and efficiently and at Government expense.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the difference in principle between transporting goods for hire by the Government in this way and doing it in connection with the Parcel Post Service of the Government generally? What difference is there in principle, now—not in operation?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I admit that the Senator's mind and my mind and I think the minds of most men who have been trying to keep track of the legislation we have been passing recently are somewhat confused on these subjects. I assume that the parcel post was drawn as a corollary, what might be one of the implied powers, from that clause of the Constitution which authorized Congress to establish mail routes and post offices and post roads. I assume so.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. STERLING. May I suggest to the Senator that there is at least this difference—that in the case of the parcel post the Government uses the private means of conveyance, the railroads, and so forth, exactly the same means that are used for the transportation of the mails; whereas in the proposed experiment the Government is to furnish the means of transportation, all the facilities of transportation, itself. There is that difference.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, that does not make any difference so far as the governmental principle at stake is concerned.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may or may not. That is a question that I have thought of myself; and I seriously doubted the constitutional power of the Government to use the mail facilities for the purpose of delivering produce and freight to the people of the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. And yet we are doing it already up to the limit of 50 pounds, or 100 pounds, I believe.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt of it; and I am confidently expecting that some Senator, if not to-day, at no remote day will propose legislation extending the parcel post so as to carry coal and freight, and do it upon the ground that he thinks it will be for the benefit of all the people.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I want to state to the Senator that already in some parts of the West they are utilizing the parcel post for hauling coal, sugar, flour, lumber, hay, and all sorts of commodities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt of it. I am not discussing the constitutionality of the parcel post now, however. The Senator from Georgia asked me a question and I was endeavoring to answer it.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, though, I want to express my disapproval of the prostitution of the Post Office Department for any such purpose as that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am inclined to think I agree with the Senator's view about that; but, Mr. President, I am not attacking this bill as unconstitutional, although I have my doubts, or at least five years ago I would have had serious doubts as to its constitutionality. I am not attacking it at all. I am simply thinking aloud, so to speak, as I read this bill over, and stating to the Senate the impressions that it makes upon me.

If the Postmaster General or his representatives in one or two instances, by straining every nerve to make it economical, and choosing the best conditions, can make a favorable showing, and if that showing is to be the basis for extending this legislation as a permanent governmental policy all over the country, based upon the experiment of six months or a year in a favored locality, there is the danger that I apprehend from this legislation.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] looks at me inquiringly. I yield to him.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to say to the Senator that I had promised to lay this bill aside at 10 minutes to 2, in order to accommodate the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish the Senator would lay it aside forever.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am sorry the Senator feels that way, because no one is in greater sympathy with some of the views the Senator has expressed than I am; but this is a practical way to relieve the people in these great cities, and we had better try it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think it may furnish some relief, but it will be at tremendous governmental expense; and it is one of those instances in which, if some people are to be relieved at governmental expense, and all the rest of the people who are not relieved are to be taxed for that purpose, it just means bankruptcy for the Government. This is an attempt to hoist yourself by your own bootstraps. It will benefit some people, and it will crush others.

Mr. President, in view of what the Senator says, I will yield the floor; but I want to make this suggestion to the Senator: Either now or in conference, if the House should pass this bill, I think there ought to be some provision inserted in it that in the conduct of experiments the department shall carry return cargoes in these motor trucks. This bill only contemplates the bringing into the cities of the products outside of the cities.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me that to make the experiment in any way possible of success it should contemplate a return cargo for the motor trucks, so that they can carry back to the farms what the farms need in the production of the food.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that is true. That would be true under the language here.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so, because it only provides for bringing in the food products from the producer to the consumer and carrying back nothing. If these motor trucks could carry back coal——

Mr. HARDWICK. Upon an examination of the language, I agree with the Senator about that. I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut and to all other Senators who have those views that I share them to some extent. This is a mere experiment. I do not know how far I am going, but I believe there is a possibility of great relief, and I only want to try it experimentally.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The trouble is, if you pass your bill without anything that will bring that subject to conference, the House will probably agree to it, and then you will not have an opportunity to have it inserted.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will do all I can, then, to try to meet the Senator's view.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I was going to suggest was something like this——

Mr. BRADY. If the Senator from Connecticut will suggest his amendment, I think it will be agreed to in a moment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know that it is at all perfect. After the words "and delivery thereof from producer to consumer," in line 5, which only contemplates one direction, I would suggest inserting the words "and the delivery of articles necessary in the production of such food products to the producer"—something like that.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. I will consent to that amendment, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It can be stricken out in conference if it is not deemed proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I call for a division.

On a division, the bill was passed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2477. That is the bill that we discussed here the other evening.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator, if he will permit me just a moment, that while I think I can vote for the Senator's bill, a Senator who was called out just a moment ago asked me to make the point of no quorum if that bill was brought up.

Mr. SWANSON. If the point of no quorum is made I will withdraw the request, because there is not a quorum here. I should like to know what Senator requested the Senator from Washington to make the point.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggested it to me. He said that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was interested in this bill and was away.

Mr. SWANSON. I talked with the Senator from Utah a short time ago, and I certainly did not have any idea from what he said to me that he would want to have this course taken. I do not want that point to be made, because I do not think there is a quorum here. We can send for the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand the Senator has sent for the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not like to make this point, but the Senator spoke to me about it downstairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the final passage of this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What bill is this?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the one for which consideration is now moved.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I mean the title of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the bill authorizing the construction of an addition to the Treasury Department Building.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will state to the Senator that if the yeas and nays have been ordered we will have to have a quorum in order to pass it. The question is whether the Senator wants to bring it up under those circumstances.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I withdraw my request. I had a talk with the Senator from Utah a short time ago and told him I was going to call it up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to suggest to the Senator that the yeas and nays have already been ordered, and it will be necessary to have a quorum on that roll-call.

Mr. SWANSON. The yeas and nays were ordered, but there has been an adjournment. Of course it comes up as a new proposition now, an adjournment having intervened.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The yeas and nays were ordered, and on that roll call, five or six days ago, the fact was developed that there was no quorum present.

Mr. SWANSON. And there was an adjournment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now I suppose the Secretary will call the roll on the vote just as he did before, and if a quorum is here——

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that it comes up as a new proposition for consideration again. I made the motion, and the yeas and nays are not ordered, after an adjournment, on the new motion to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BRANGEGEE. The Chair rules that they are ordered, and if the Secretary calls the roll it will end the question, will it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is about 2 o'clock, and if there is no objection I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose in the statement I shall make to-day to go into a discussion of the details of this bill, or the amendments thereto proposed by the Finance Committee. I believe that the details can be better and more profitably discussed and debated as the amendments are reached.

Before entering upon a discussion of the amendments it is only proper that I should say, for the members of the Finance Committee, that the bill as amended reflects the best thought and judgment of the committee after the most laborious and painstaking investigation. The committee has considered all the factors which in their opinion should be taken into account in levying the taxes necessary to finance the war.

Your committee devoted more than eight weeks to the consideration of the bill, sitting long hours during nearly every day of that period. The House committee had held no hearings on the bill and because of that fact the Finance Committee, in response to a very general demand of the business interests throughout the country, devoted a full week to hearings. These hearings were attended by representative men of the industries of the country affected by the provisions of the bill as passed by the House. The oral statements and arguments of these business representatives, these representative taxpayers, were supplemented by briefs, and the arguments and briefs constitute a printed volume of about 620 pages.

Day by day after the hearings were closed the chairman of the committee and individual members of the committee held informal conferences with hundreds of these representatives.

I wish to say here, Mr. President, that I do not believe that in all of my experience there has been quite as much interest in congressional hearings as in those on this bill. Practically the entire membership of the committee attended the hearings every day and manifested the deepest interest. I am sure no member of the committee has refused to meet anyone who has come here to discuss these questions with him.

Among other sources of information, the committee in its investigations and study at all times had the benefit of experts assigned to it by the Treasury Department and by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. It also had the valuable assistance of the Tariff Commission, especially that of Dr. F. W. Taussig, the very able chairman of that commission. That commission voluntarily placed its entire force at the service of the committee in obtaining and compiling information desired by the committee and in making such investigations as the committee requested.

Mr. President, as a result, the amendments made by your committee, by elimination or by addition or modification, have been made advisedly and with deliberation. Nothing has been done in haste; nothing decided without full consideration. Every member of your committee at every stage has shown a keen sense of responsibility in imposing upon the people of this country the greatest burden of taxation ever put upon them. In its long and laborious investigations, deliberations, and discussions, I am gratified to be able to say to the Senate and to the country, there was at no time any partisan rancor or manifestation of sectionalism or any purpose or desire to selfishly protect local interests. But there was every indication of an earnest desire to frame a bill which would raise, with justice to everybody and to every interest, the necessary revenue to finance the great undertaking in which, with many other nations, we are now engaged.

As a result of these deliberations, your committee has made many fundamental, and some radical, changes in the House bill, and now submits the result of its labors without pride of opinion for such action as the Senate may see fit to take. But it presents this bill, as amended, with the confident expression of opinion that the changes made therein have greatly improved and strengthened it, and it is pleased to believe from the evidence which has come to it and its individual members that these changes will receive, when understood, the hearty approval of the country.

Mr. President, I regret very much to have to say to the Senate that neither this bill nor the report which comes to this body as the report of the committee has the unanimous approval of its members. While there were differences which resulted in three members of the committee refusing to give their assent to the report, it is gratifying to be able to state that these differences were not over the plan or method of taxation as written in the amended bill but chiefly over the source from which the money required should be obtained. Nor was there a disagreement in regard to granting the Government all the revenue it asked, nor as to the general proposition that the amount needed for the estimated expenses based upon appropriations already made, should be raised altogether by internal taxation. The line of cleavage was as to whether a part or the whole of the $2,000,000,000, sought to be obtained, should be raised from taxes upon incomes, war profits, and intoxicating beverages.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish the explanation. As I understood it, the minority members accepted the plan of taxation on incomes, war profits, and beverages, but insisted that the whole $2,000,000,000 should be raised from this source. The majority members did not agree to that proposition, and there, I understand, is the line of cleavage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to interpose at this time for a correction.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to be corrected if I am in error or have misrepresented the attitude of the dissenting members of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In this regard. The Senator, as chairman of the committee, will remember that it is the position of the minority, first, that on principle a much larger proportion of the amount of the revenue required for the fiscal year shall be raised by taxation than is provided in the bill, to the end that an excessive bond issue will not be necessary for providing the needed revenue for the fiscal year; and, second, that all of the amount required to be raised by taxation for this fiscal year shall be raised from incomes, war profits, and alcoholic liquors and tobacco.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; undoubtedly that was the attitude of the dissenting minority, but that does not at all militate against the statement I have made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; except, if the Senator will pardon me, the statement was incomplete without that addition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this bill does not propose to raise the entire $2,000,000,000 called for by the Treasury Department from taxes on incomes, war profits, and alcoholic beverages. It does provide (according to the estimates) for $1,546,000,000, practically three-fourths of that amount from those three sources. It proposes to raise the remainder by taxes on a number of things; some of them consumption taxes, some of them subsidiary taxes in the nature of excise taxes; but taxes in practically every instance that in their nature and necessary application will be widely distributed among the great masses of the people. Practically everybody will contribute, through these taxes to some extent—small in some instances and not heavy in any instance—toward defraying the expenses of the cause for which we are about to call to the colors 2,000,000 young men.

Mr. President, just here let me say one word about our system of taxation and the necessity which the present situation requires for its further development. Before this war our total expenditures were very small, comparatively speaking. They seemed large then, but compared with the present requirements they seem small. Ordinarily, before the war, our expenditures were somewhere between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 annually, excluding postal expenditures and the sinking-fund requirements. Several hundred million dollars of that amount we raised through customs duties. Because that system of taxation had been long in force in this country, covering nearly all of the things that the people consumed, we had developed a reasonably scientific tariff system, according to the theories of the political party which happened to be in power at the time of the revision, but the remainder of the revenues were raised from internal taxes, imposed almost exclusively upon tobacco and spirits. Because of the simplicity of this and the small number of articles affected by that tax, there has been at no time the least effort to establish in this country a scientific or logical system of internal taxes. It has not been necessary. The conditions which obtain at the present time, and which will continue certainly during the war, and probably for many years after the war, have changed that situation altogether. It is now evident that the expenditures during this fiscal year will reach something like $10,000,000,000. It is expected that three billion three hundred and thirty-odd million dollars of that large amount will be raised by taxation; and of this latter amount, under the existing law and under this bill, it is proposed to raise $3,000,000,000—all except $330,000,000—by internal taxes, not only upon the two products which I have named but in such a way as to embrace practically all the products of the industries of the country.

In these conditions your committee was profoundly impressed with the expediency of broadening and developing our system of special taxation so as to present a scientific scheme logically constructed; so framed as to provide a superstructure sufficiently strong and flexible to meet not only the present war-revenue requirements, but the future needs of the Government; so proportioned and so adjusted as to distribute equitably the necessary burdens of taxation and safeguard the activities of the Nation by imposing no tax which would not leave the taxpayer a reasonably compensatory return from his investment, having also due regard to necessary growth and expansion.

The basis of the system proposed by your committee rests upon the income and war-profits taxes, internal-revenue taxes upon whisky and tobacco, and certain moderate subsidiary levies in the nature of excise taxes.

The system presented is in form much the same as that in the House bill, but it has, it is believed, been systematized, coordinated, and made more consistent. The income and war-profits taxes, the basic part of the system, have been better adjusted to each other, while the latter has been broadened and raised to a parity with the former in the machinery of the scheme and in its revenue-producing qualities.

In fixing the rates upon incomes and profits your committee kept constantly in mind the facts that the amount of money derived from these sources would depend upon the activity and prosperity of business, and that to impose taxes which would tend to discourage enterprise and check these activities would tend to defeat the legislative purpose by reducing the revenue expected from the tax. Moreover, we thought, if the rates upon incomes and profits were fixed in the beginning at the very highest possible level of revenue-producing results, little margin would be left for future increases, if needed. In carrying its views in this regard your committee sought to provide not only a safe and sound substructure but to regulate the rates so as not to exhaust the source of supply by the first draft, but to leave a reserve to be drawn upon in future if the needs of the Government shall make it necessary without injustice and without oppression.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him questions as he proceeds? I wish the Senator would explain what per cent of what is known as war profits are taken under this bill for revenue purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a graduated rate, I will say to the Senator. It depends altogether upon the increase of the profits of the taxable year over the profits of the prewar period, which we have selected as the test.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is what is known as the war profits tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; war profits tax.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the Senator give the difference between the war profits and the prewar profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me to do that a little further on? The prewar profits are the average profits of the years 1911, 1912, and 1913—the war profits are the profits of the taxable year in excess of the prewar profits.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I asked the Senator before interrupting if it would be agreeable for me to ask him a question at this time. I do not desire, of course, to break the continuity of the Senator's thought.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator this graduated scale begins at 12 per cent and then gradually rises until it reaches 50 per cent, according to the increase in the profits over those of the basic or test period.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought if it were succinctly stated it would be very much easier to comprehend by the lay mind such as my own.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be glad to go further into that a little later on.

Mr. President, in pursuing this program, your committee began its labors by eliminating from the bill as it passed the House certain provisions and, in some instances, whole titles, because it thought them either illogical, unjust, or fraught with dangers or disturbing interference with sound economic conditions.

I do not desire now or at any time during this statement to discuss all of the things of greater or lesser importance that we eliminated from the bill. I shall confine my statement to the more important ones.

For these reasons, among others, we struck from the bill what is known as the retroactive income tax provision. That provision imposed a tax of 33⅓ per cent upon the incomes of partnerships and corporations for the year 1916. We struck that section from the bill because we felt that, while such taxes might not be subject to the criticism of being unconstitutional, they would undoubtedly be subject to the criticism of being retroactive. Retroactive legislation has always been, even when constitutional, exceedingly unpopular in this country, because regarded as unfair.

In this instance it would have been an imposition upon incomes that have already been distributed and, in many instances, put back into productive business or spent or consumed in living; and in some instances it is not at all unlikely that the recipients of these incomes, if now called upon to pay the additional tax, would find it not only burdensome but extremely difficult to raise the money with which to pay it. It would, in a word, be one of those disturbing taxes which would alarm business and check industrial productivity, to which we must look as our chief source of taxation. It is very poor economy to take money in a way which will cause losses far outweighing the momentary gain. Moreover, it is to be remembered that if we admit the principle of retroactive taxation running back six months we also assert the right to carry it back for one year or 10 years, or for any length of time. To do this would hold out a threat of uncertainty in tax conditions. Uncertainty is almost the greatest foe of business productivity and prosperity. For these reasons the committee had no doubt as to the wisdom of striking from the bill the retroactive tax on incomes. The Ways and Means Committee estimated that the revenue from this section of the bill would amount to $108,000,000. Prior returns indicate that this tax would have amounted to $117,000,000.

The provisions of the House bill imposing a tax of 5 per cent upon the gross sales of the products of certain industries seemed to your committee undesirable and as a general proposition unfair and unwarranted. A gross sales tax of 5 per cent is in itself a very severe tax, but, when you consider that a gross sales tax of 5 per cent is equivalent to a net income tax of from 25 to 50 per cent, it appears unreasonably high; especially when this tax is levied upon industries which under the bill are required to pay heavy income taxes upon incomes and profits derived from the sale of products so specially taxed.

It is a tax upon the very thing from which are derived these profits and income which have already been taxed. Moreover, Mr. President, in general terms a gross tax is an incitement to poorer quality and higher prices, while a net tax has not this destructive principle. I do not know whether it is accurate to say that such a levy is taxation in the third degree, but your committee certainly thought it unjustifiable and accordingly eliminated these taxes from the bill except in a few instances, entirely exceptional in character, where the tax was reduced from 5 to 2 per cent. We felt that only where the conditions are exceptional could such a tax be justifiable, and then only at a lesser rate. We thought that articles used in certain amusement games, such as tennis rackets, billiard and pool balls, billiard and pool tables, checker and chess boards, dice, etc., should bear a moderate tax of this character, and acting upon this principle we retained the gross-sales tax imposed by the House bill upon these and certain like articles, but reduced the rate of 5 per cent of the House bill to 2 per cent.

The same general considerations hold with reference to the gross-sales tax imposed by the House bill upon perfumes, cosmetics, patent medicines, and certain other similar articles. Most of these articles are sold under privately owned formulæ, and are more or less the subject of monopoly. Because of the character of the goods and the element of monopoly therein your committee thought that a moderate gross-sales tax to be paid by the manufacturer would be justified, and acting upon this principle, while retaining the gross-sales tax as provided in the House bill, we reduced the rate from 5 per cent to 2 per cent.

Your committee felt constrained to eliminate entirely the tariff section of the bill. This title imposes heavy additional duties on imports, consisting not merely of further levies upon articles taxed by existing law, but a flat duty of 10 per cent ad valorem upon all articles now on the free list. The report of the Ways and Means Committee estimates that the Government would receive $200,000,000 from these duties. According to the theories of the party to which I belong—theories based upon facts and experience—while the Government might get $200,000,000 from this tax upon practically every article now embraced in the free and dutiable schedules, the cost to consumers would be multiplied many times. The three and four thousand articles in question constitute things that are consumed in every home in the land, embracing necessaries and luxuries, raw materials and finished products, lumber and lace (as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] says), silk and homespun. Such a tax would permit American producers to levy a tax of their own two or three times the amount that would go into the Public Treasury. Not only would it be the highest aggregate tariff ever enacted in this country, but it would be one of the most oppressive taxes on the masses of the people. No man, no woman, and no child in this country could escape it and live. It would pile up burdens upon the people such as they have never had to bear before.

Why do I say that, Mr. President? Because in the past, irrespective of the party in power, we have so written our tariff laws that one-half, or nearly one-half—say, between two-fifths and one-half—of all the importations into the country have been upon the free list. Before the repeal of the Payne-Aldrich law 50 per cent or probably a little more of the importations coming into this country were upon the free list. At present, and even before the European war, under the present tariff law considerably more than 50 per cent were free of duty. This free list had two purposes in view: First, to relieve the burden of the poor man, the average man, with respect to the necessaries of life; secondly, to allow the industries of the country, through importing free raw materials, to sell in the domestic and in the foreign markets at lower rates. This provision of the House bill takes no notice of either of these principles underlying tariff legislation previously enacted, but it goes to the very bottom, and imposes a flat tax of 10 per cent upon all importations of whatever kind or character, with probably 10 or 15 articles excepted from its operations.

Mr. President, there were other and special reasons why this should not be done, in addition to the general reasons I have given in the statement just made. It seemed obvious to your committee that so sweeping a change as that proposed in this section of the House bill would have brought about many undesirable consequences. Every duty levied in the existing tariff at a specific rate would at once have become a compound duty, partly specific and partly ad valorem, and thus would have become subject to all the administrative difficulties which result from the combination of specific and ad valorem duties. Many petty duties, or additions to duties, would have been levied, on which the cost of collection would not have been justified by the accruing revenue. Existing ad valorem duties would necessarily have been affected unequally. The disproportion in the relative changes of duty is obvious.

The relations between duties on raw materials and those on finished products would necessarily have been completely changed by the flat House 10 per cent ad valorem increase.

On a number of articles, both on the free and on the dutiable list, if any duties at all are to be imposed for revenue, they should be specific, not ad valorem. Such, for example, is the case with duties on coffee, tea, sugar, and some chemicals. On these specific duties are not only easier of administration, but do not cause such fluctuations in revenue and in business conditions as would result from ad valorem duties.

Again, there are a considerable number of commodities the supply of which is inadequate to the demand. As a striking example, the committee would refer to tin, of which only a few weeks' supply is at present available. Other articles on which the imposition of any duty at all seems objectionable under present conditions are manganese and manganiferous ore, of tremendous military importance in manufacturing steel, and obtained largely by importation. Nickel, also of vital importance for naval and military uses, is obtained almost exclusively by importation from Canada, and the supply should not be restricted.

For these and other reasons I will not stop to enumerate, your committee has stricken this taxation out of the bill.

The House bill imposed this tax of 10 per cent ad valorem, as I said, upon necessaries and luxuries alike. Together with everything else, it imposed this rate of tax upon the importations of sugar, coffee, tea, and cocoa. In striking out this title of the bill we decided to retain as subjects of taxation sugar, tea, coffee, and cocoa, and we have placed upon those articles a very light excise tax.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Before the Senator goes to that subject, do I understand from the statement just made that this tax of 10 per cent ad valorem applied to all raw materials and finished products alike?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Not one of these articles retained by your committee for taxation is subject to a tax much higher, or differing materially from the tax imposed upon it in the House bill. Nor can any one of the articles so taxed be regarded as an absolute necessity of life. They are spoken of as necessaries, but they are not really necessaries. They are regarded as legitimate subjects of excise tax in all countries of the world, I believe. Nearly all the nations at war are taxing them at a rate very much higher than the tax we propose. In addition to that, every dollar that will be collected from these articles under the tax we propose will go into the Treasury. Not one dollar of it will go, either directly or indirectly, to the producer or the manufacturer; and there is no way that I can see in which the domestic producer or manufacturer will be able to use this particular tax for the purpose of extorting from the people a higher price for his products.

Mr. President, I might say more with reference to this matter, but I think it unnecessary.

I should add that we also struck out the title of the bill with reference to inheritance and insurance taxes. Those are general questions involving broad questions of public policy, which I will not discuss now. When reached, they will be discussed fully by other members of the committee. What I am trying to do now is to get before the Senate those facts that probably can not be said to be of common knowledge with reference to the particular things in the bill which we have changed, eliminated, or added.

Another important provision of the House bill—important in its effects upon a class of our people and in the sense that it was estimated to yield a large revenue—is the provision imposing taxes upon the disbursements of the householder, the family, the home; monthly disbursements or quarterly disbursements, as the case may be, for light and heat and gas and electricity and household telephone service—5 per cent upon the amount paid by the householders in the cities and in the country from one end of the land to the other for light to dispel the darkness of the night, for heat in the dead of winter, for gas with which to cook, or electricity for the fan or iron, and for the household telephone.

I believe it was estimated under the House bill that $30,000,000 would be raised from this source; and yet, Mr. President, members of the committee that framed that bill and reported it have severely and unjustly, I think, gone to the newspapers and other public prints, and made the charge that your committee had favored the rich against the poor, not because we had placed a tax upon sugar, coffee, tea, and cocoa, but because we changed the provisions of their bill and retained these articles on the tax list. The House proposal for a tax upon these household bills (5 per cent upon the amount of each bill) would amount to nearly half as much as the total tax on sugar, coffee, tea, and cocoa.

Mr. President, we also struck out the zone system of taxation upon second-class mail matter, as developed in the House bill. Your committee was constrained to eliminate this section because we were convinced by the statements, oral and written, presented to us by representatives of a very large number of the periodicals, newspapers, and magazines of the country, large and small, that if this tax were imposed upon them in addition to the prices they are now forced to pay for their paper, it would in many cases mean absolute ruin. In nearly all instances it would impose a burden difficult to bear, with probable suspension of publication in some cases.

Mr. President, I do not believe there has ever been in the history of congressional hearings such a powerful presentation of facts as on this point, sustained and corroborated by statements from their ledgers, by men whose veracity could not be doubted. This evidence showed that disastrous consequences would result without materially increasing the revenues of the Government. However much the committee differed as to what tax should be imposed upon this class of business, I do not think, as I recall it—and if I am wrong, the members of the committee will correct me—that there was any difference of opinion about this matter. My colleague on the committee [Mr. SMOOT] tells me that one Senator was opposed to it. I shall not now discuss the tax we have substituted for the zone system of taxation proposed by the House because one of my associates on the committee has advised me he will take up that phase of the bill.

I come now to the income tax. The bill, as originally reported to the Senate on July 7, accepted the House income rates, with the elimination of what is known as the Lenroot amendment. The last bracket in the schedule of that bill imposed a tax of 50 per cent on incomes in excess of $1,000,000. The Lenroot amendment imposed an additional tax of 25 per cent on incomes in excess of $40,000. Both the Lenroot amendment and the last bracket, the two things your committee struck out of this title of the bill, were added to the rates of the bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, upon the floor of the House. In other words, neither of these two eliminated amendments was in the bill when the Ways and Means Committee reported it to the House. Taken together they made the total highest rate, including the surtax and normal taxes imposed by the present law and by the bill adopted by the House. It raised the rate to the high level of 62 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what incomes would have been subject to a tax of 62 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. Those over $2,000,000. In other words, the bill as originally reported to the Senate by the committee accepted all the rates of the bill as it was reported by the Ways and Means Committee to the House.

In view of these facts, Mr. President, I have been surprised to read a severe criticism of the Finance Committee's action in striking out the Lenroot amendment by one who not only voted against that amendment but fought it to a finish with his characteristic ability and zeal.

In the bill as finally reported to the Senate the Finance Committee added two additional amendments affecting the tax under this title of the bill. The first of these amendments increased the normal tax on individual incomes to an amount equivalent in revenue-producing possibilities to 1 per cent. But instead of imposing it by way of an increase upon the normal tax we have imposed it by increasing certain brackets in the graduated scale described in the bill. No one whose income does not exceed $15,000 will be affected by these increases. The increases only apply to the surtax, in other words, on incomes in excess of $15,000, running from 1 to 3 per cent on the brackets between $15,000 and the highest income. The rate upon the highest income remains the same as that in the original bill of the Ways and Means Committee.

The second of these amendments further increases the corporate income tax, generally spoken of as the corporate normal income tax, by adding 2 per cent to the House bill rate. Under the existing law the rate on corporations is 2 per cent. The House raised that to 4 per cent just as it did the normal tax on the individual. We increased it 2 per cent more, making it 6 per cent. The result is that corporations will pay a normal tax of 6 per cent while the individual will pay a normal tax of only 4 per cent. Heretofore the normal tax on both has been the same. In the bill as it came from the House both taxes were the same.

The reasons for these changes are twofold:

First. The necessity for increased revenue on account of the large deficiency estimates for the Army presented by the Secretary of the Treasury after the bill was recommitted, at my request, on account of the Smoot amendment to the food-control bill.

Second. Because of the necessity for a partial adjustment on account of an alleged and apparent discrimination against partnerships and individuals in favor of corporations in respect to surtaxes on incomes.

The able Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], a member of the Finance Committee, early in our deliberations brought to our attention the fact that there appeared to be and was as a matter of fact a discrimination against copartnerships and in favor of corporations in the matter of surtaxes. When we decided to extend the war-profit tax to individuals that discrimination in favor of corporations was accentuated. I shall take a few minutes to explain to the Senate the situation out of which this discrimination grew. Of course an individual's income is automatically distributed. Under the law as it now exists and as provided in the bill as passed by the House the annual earnings of a copartnership are regarded as distributed whether actually distributed or not. For the purpose of income taxes it is assumed to come automatically into the hands of the individual members of the copartnership, although actually retained in the business and not distributed and thereby becomes subject to the surtax.

On the other hand, the incomes of corporations, under the present law and the House bill, do not become subject to surtax until actually distributed among shareholders.

The Senator from New Mexico urged strongly that this was a situation which should be met in some way. Your committee shared that view. The first suggestion was to apply to the corporation the rule that now applies to the partnership and to treat the surplus as distributed for the purpose of the income tax whether in fact distributed or not. But upon investigation it was found that this might be open to constitutional objections. Besides, it might work very great hardship, especially upon a minority shareholder, who would be required to pay a tax upon an income which he had not received and which he could not force the corporation, notwithstanding his property right, to declare. Finally we decided upon what we have spoken of since as a corporation surtax. We agreed upon a flat tax of 15 per cent upon undistributed corporate earnings, allowing an exemption of 20 per cent of the annual earnings.

That seemed to us, Mr. President, to be a partial solution that might work no great hardship. But we were not quite satisfied we had made a wise solution and as the result of further investigation and information became convinced that the plan should in justice and in good policy be modified. Your committee acted with the earnest desire to be absolutely just and fair in levying these taxes.

I wish to say here, Mr. President, that I have seen in this committee from the beginning to the end nothing but a desire to find out the facts and to do what was just and fair.

Your committee was at once beseiged, not by the representatives of the big corporations of the country, not by the little corporations of the country, nor the moderate corporations of the country, but from every part of the country. The corporate interests of the country without exception so far as I know protested and presented convincing facts to support their protest, that to require them at the present time either to distribute their surplus or to pay a tax of 15 per cent upon it if retained, would be several times the price of money in the open market; that it would under present conditions impose a serious handicap upon corporately conducted business.

They urged with much force that in the past it had been the almost universal rule of corporations to retain a large part of their annual earnings for maintenance, for betterments, for extensions, and replenishments; and that it was the experience of the business world from the beginning of corporate existence, both here and in other countries, that a corporation which made a practice of distributing all its annual earnings was on the road to bankruptcy. We had this situation investigated by the efficient and adequate force of the Tariff Commission and such was found to be the general practice of corporations in normal times and under normal conditions.

The suggestion had been made that the retention of earnings was for the purpose of escaping and avoiding the income surtaxes, but it was found that before incomes taxes were imposed by our laws, before there was any possible advantage to be gained from such practice, it was the universal custom and practice. It was pointed out to us that under present conditions, differing so materially from those of the past, it was not only absolutely necessary for them as heretofore to retain a portion of their surplus, but that if they did not do it to a very much larger extent than under ordinary conditions they would be utterly unable to meet the requirements of the present war and emergency situation. They said, and we found it to be true, that to meet the great demands now laid upon the industries of the country, to supply not only the enlarged demands both normal and due to the war at home and abroad, it has been necessary for them to extend their business, to greatly increase their capital, and to employ the capital to meet that demand it was necessary for them to retain as much of their annual earnings as possible.

It was urged before your committee that this situation was greatly complicated by the fact that the Government in the flotation of its bonds and securities to finance the war and to help our allies had to a large extent preempted the investment markets of the country. Taking all these matters into consideration, your committee decided that the equities of the situation would be best adjusted by imposing a surtax upon such portion of the retained surplus that is not necessary for the reasonable requirements of the business and by making the corporate tax 2 per cent in excess of the normal income tax.

By this change it is estimated the Government will derive $180,000,000 from the 2 per cent additional tax on corporations.

It is also provided that if any concern, under the pretext that a certain amount was necessary, retained more than the Secretary of the Treasury ultimately found necessary to meet the reasonable requirements, it should pay a tax of 15 per cent instead of 10 per cent upon the amount so improperly retained.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCUMBER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, it is going to take me much longer than I anticipated. Will the Senator wait until I have finished? These interruptions break the continuity of the statement and the argument, and I would prefer to have the Senator ask the question later, if it will answer his purpose as well.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The next amendment we have made to this income tax which is of special importance is the substitution of information at the source for collection at the source as provided in the present income-tax law. I am not going to discuss this at length. I shall ask to put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks extracts from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury strongly recommending to the Congress this substitution. The ground upon which the department has put its recommendation is that the information which the Government will get by this substitution will be of great advantage, especially in view of the fact that of the $360,000,000 income tax collected last year less than $9,000,000 was collected at the source. The expense of collection from the source is also very great, and the experience of the department has satisfied both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and everybody concerned that it will be very much to the interest of the Government to make this substitution.

The Secretary says:

> I desire very earnestly to impress upon those charged with the enactment of income-tax legislation that it is the department's judgment, based upon a close observation and study of the practical workings of the "withholding" feature of the income-tax law, as well as the general requirements of administration, that "information at the source" is a foundation upon which the administrative structure must be built if the income-tax law is to be rendered most effective, and if due regard is to be paid to economy and simplicity of administration and to the imposition of no greater burden and expense upon taxpayers than is necessary for effective administration.
> A very large proportion of all claims for refunds under the income tax (approximately 80 per cent) arise out of excessive and erroneous withholding at the source. As the average cost of adjusting a claim for refund is $10, a very considerable economy will result from doing away with the expenses incident to withholding at the source.

The committee recommends the substitution, as thus proposed, of "information at the source" for "withholding at the source." This is a fundamental change in the bill; there is no question about that, but the only material, the only real objection we have heard to it has come from certain interests who have some connection in one way or another with contracts contained in certain corporation bonds, with reference to the payment under certain conditions of any Federal tax that might be imposed upon the income from those companies. They have been very active in opposition to the abolition of payment at the source. While payment at the source was required, the Government became an indirect agent to enforce these private contracts, with which it has nothing to do and which have nothing to do with the revenues of the Government. I might say in passing that we have put the seal of our condemnation upon the class of contracts out of which this controversy grows by providing that in the future they shall be unlawful.

There is one other amendment to the income-tax section which I wish briefly to call to the attention of the Senate.

Under the House bill page 10, lines 19–23, incomes derived by corporations from dividends in other corporations subject to the excess-profits tax are exempted to the extent of that tax.

The Senate committee amendments extend this provision so as to give like exemption to the tax on corporate incomes.

The effect of the House bill is that if a distributing corporation has paid the war excess profits tax, the receiving corporation does not pay it again, but under the House bill if the distributing corporation has paid the corporate income tax on dividends the receiving corporation also must pay it.

Under the Senate bill the receiving corporation will not have to pay the tax again in either case.

Under these circumstances, the criticism of the action of your committee in this regard made by certain members of the Ways and Means Committee is unwarranted.

But your committee had another reason for this amendment.

Under the present law and in the House bill an individual who receives dividends on stock in a corporation is allowed an exemption in his normal income tax of the tax paid by the corporation. The tax having been paid once he does not have to pay it again.

Why then should a corporation holding stock in another corporation not be entitled to the same exemption?

Your committee thought that there was no reason why individuals and corporations in this matter should not be treated alike, and that there was no reason why either should pay again a tax which has already been paid.

The Senate bill, however, differs from the House bill in this respect:

While the House bill allows each intermediate subsidiary corporation to make the deduction, the Senate bill allows only one deduction.

Your committee thinks in both respects the amendments it recommends are much fairer and more equitable than the House bill.

I now come to the war-profits tax.

Mr. President, I wish to ask the attention of the Senate while I discuss some phases of the war-profits tax as redrafted by your committee. Your committee acted upon the theory that the chief source of revenue to finance the war is incomes and war profits. These sources are chiefly relied upon by other nations, and they seem to us to afford the best source from which to draw the revenues to meet war expenses. Under the Senate amendment $1,340,000,000 of the total levy of $2,009,000,000 will be raised from those two sources.

Apparently the other House did not take the same view of this matter as did the Senate committee, especially with reference to war profits, either in the manner of levying the taxes or as to the amount levied, because the House bill, it is estimated, would raise only $200,000,000 from war profits.

In view of the fact, Mr. President, that the war profits of 1916 reached fully $3,000,000,000 and that the Government budget now requires $2,000,000,000, we thought $200,000,000 from war profits was entirely too small a sum—yea, an almost ridiculously small sum from the beneficiaries of these almost unbelievable profits. We felt the House bill was entirely too lenient to those who have reaped this rich harvest of gold through the high prices these war conditions have made possible. We have rewritten this section of the bill, changed the base and the rates. As a result of these changes it is estimated that the revenue from our bill for the year 1917 will be $562,000,000, instead of $200,000,000.

The Senate draft of this title of the bill differs very materially from the House draft as to the method of ascertaining the normal income of the taxpayer and as to the method of imposing the tax. The House bill proceeds upon the assumption that everybody, in whatever occupation or business engaged, was making identically the same per cent of profit before the war. It is a standard based upon a manifest fallacy; upon an assumption that our experience tells us does not conform to the facts. Everybody does not make, and everybody never did make, the same percentage of profits. If you are going to tax war profits you must ascertain in some just and equitable way the actual prewar profits of the individual taxpayer. The standard must reflect the facts of the individual case, and it must be equitable. It must be founded upon fact and upon truth and not upon assumption and fiction.

The bitter, intense opposition to the House measure, which was reflected in the hearings before the Finance Committee, which have been printed and are in the possession of Senators, shows that the objection was not to the amount of the tax—for that was so exceedingly low in view of the conditions that nobody could object to it—it was upon the ground that the base upon which the tax was made to rest was a fictitious base—one that did not reflect the facts.

We struck this arbitrary standard out and substituted a standard based upon the actual results of each man's business operations. We allow a deduction of the average profits actually made during the three years immediately preceding the outbreak of the war. We make provision for exceptional cases where, by reason of misfortune, or of circumstances, a man was not making a normal profit during that period but was making an abnormally low profit compared with the profits of like business. Under the bill now before you, if the Secretary of the Treasury shall find that a man's profit was abnormally low during the three last years, he must permit him to have an exemption equal to the average profits made by representative concerns in like business during those three prewar years.

We selected the three years named in the bill because, after a very thorough investigation on the part of the experts, comparing all the years between 1909 and 1915—1909 being the year in which we first began to get reports from corporations under the income-tax law—we were advised, taking the business of the whole country into account, that the years selected were the most favorable group for the average taxpayer; but it is charged, Mr. President, that our base is wrong and that the base of the House is correct.

I have looked up this matter with a view to ascertaining what base is used by European countries which have imposed war profits taxes. I find that all the countries engaged in war are imposing this kind of tax, as are practically all the neutral countries on the western coast of Europe. As the result of that investigation I find that the following countries fix their prewar profits for the purposes of this tax upon the same basis we do. Great Britain allows the average profits of two prewar years out of three; France three prewar years, exactly as ours; Italy two prewar years, 1913 and 1914; Russia two prewar years; Germany three of five prewar years, excluding the best and the worst; Austria three of five prewar years, excluding the best and the worst; Denmark two of the three, 1912, 1913, and 1914; Norway, two years; Sweden, two years; and Holland three years, just as ours. The only two countries out of the 14 countries, one at war and the other a neutral—one in Europe and the other on this continent—imposing a war-profits tax upon any other than the base provided in this bill, are Spain and Canada.

This species of tax is not a new thing in countries of the world. At the very outset of the war, European countries began to impose this tax. The base is the same to-day as it was in the beginning, except for some immaterial changes. This base has been adopted throughout Europe, with the exception of Spain. During all of these three trying war years the rising rate of taxation has made it more and more necessary that the base should be just, equitable, and sound.

But, Mr. President, it is claimed by some that not only our base is wrong but that the graduated scale we have substituted for the flat scale of the House is wrong. If it is the purpose of the Congress to make no distinction between the man who is making only a moderately increased profit out of war conditions and that numerous class of operators in this country whose war profits are now 100 per cent, 200 per cent, 300 per cent, or even 1,000 per cent greater than before the war, then we ought to adopt the House excess-profits scheme. That scheme is a profits tax differing in principle only slightly from the normal income tax. If Congress has in mind that kind of tax to raise the war funds, it can attain its purpose by simply raising the income rate sufficiently high to get the money. Your committee has not so interpreted the will of the people or the desire of Congress. It believes the people want those making these great war profits to be taxed at a rate in proportion to the increase in war profits. We have therefore sought to make this tax not a mere extension of our peace-time income tax but truly a war-profits tax. To accomplish this purpose we propose a scale of rates graduated as is our income surtax, so that the man making a large additional profit shall pay at a higher rate than the man making a small additional profit. It is the belief of your committee that this is the way these swollen profits can be adequately reached.

Prior to the war, when men were supposed to be making only normal profits, when the profits of one man were not supposed to be greatly out of proportion to the profits of another, and those of one industry not out of proportion to those of another, we wrote into the law imposing taxes upon the incomes of the people derived from their business activities what is known as the surtax, which is a graduated tax starting at a low base and going up and up by steps until it reaches the big income and imposing upon that income a tax, of course, altogether out of proportion to the surtax put upon the lower income. Mr. President, if we have, as a matter of equity and right, in taxing the incomes made in peace times, applied this differentiation, why should we refuse to apply it in taxing war profits?

It has been charged in the public prints by men in authority, Members of the Congress, by way of criticism and animadversion upon the Senate amendments to the bill, that through these amendments many of the great corporations of the country, the trusts and the monopolies, and the railroads will escape taxation. There is no foundation for these criticisms of the Senate amendments. Similar charges were brought against the House bill long before the Senate committee had changed a word or line in it.

Under the 8 per cent method of determining prewar profits of the House bill undoubtedly many of the great corporations and trusts of the country who are now making enormous war profits would, by reason of overcapitalization and watered stock, largely, if not altogether, escape the proposed tax.

This was made quite clear to your committee not merely by information and statistics obtained through the departments and other sources but from the statements of representative men, thoroughly familiar with corporate practices and organization, who appeared before us in vigorous protest against this part of the House bill.

These representatives of business interests attacked the House excess-profits proposal as discriminatory and unjust. They declared that some of the strongest and richest corporations in this country would not pay a dollar upon the 8 per cent basis of the House scheme because of overcapitalization. They charged that hundreds of big concerns with listed stock selling at high prices would pay nothing under this 8 per cent basis, while corporations organized upon a conservative basis would be hard hit. They charged that under the House 8 per cent capitalization scheme good will, trade-marks, trade names, and so forth, were given exemptions which were denied to equally valuable good will, trade-marks, and trade names, and so forth, built up by energy, ingenuity, and self-denial. Finally, they maintained that the provisions of the House bill would be avoided by the simple process of reorganization, matters being so arranged that the full present value of assets would be capitalized and a cash payment made for the value of good will.

The indictment which these men made against the House bill in these respects could not well have been stronger.

It is charged that the Senate war-profits scheme will exempt the railroads from taxation. That charge against the Senate scheme is unwarranted. It is true, however, that many of the railroads, in fact most of them, would escape taxation under the House scheme altogether, while only a few of them would pay any tax at all, and that but a very small tax.

Under the House scheme the railroads would be allowed an exemption of 8 per cent upon their capitalization as their prewar profits, while as a matter of fact their average earnings during the three or four years immediately preceding the war were less than 5 per cent. Thus, the House scheme would have allowed the railroads an exemption of nearly twice as much as they were earning during the prewar period. But few of these roads are earning more than 8 per cent upon their inflated capital now, so it is obvious that under the House scheme they would not be taxed.

Without taking up too much time of the Senate I wish to show by facts that can not be disputed that under the Senate scheme of ascertaining the prewar basis for exemptions and taxing by a graduated scale, neither the big corporations, nor the trusts, nor the railroads will escape. On the contrary, they will pay a very much larger tax than under the House scheme.

In the hearing the railroads did not appear to protest against the House bill, and we did not hear from them until we changed the House prewar standard of ascertaining normal profits. Then they came—presidents of the great railroads of the country with their lawyers. The hearings had been closed, but they asked the privilege of informal talks with members of the committee. They came in protest against the Senate bill, not because they could find any infirmity in the principle, but because they contended they would be heavily taxed under the Senate scheme. They made no attempt to conceal the fact that they would not be reached by the excess-profits provisions of the House bill. They brought with them a brief showing the large sums that the representative railroads of the country would have to pay as war-profits taxes under the Senate bill.

When that brief was presented to me by the chief attorney of the roads in Washington—I shall not call his name, but he is one of the most distinguished lawyers in the country, a man whose probity, honesty, ability, and uprightness nobody questions—when he presented that brief to me and called my attention to the fact that the railroads would be mulcted in heavy taxes, as shown in the tables in the brief, I said: "Why have you not included here tables to show how much tax the railroads would have to pay under the House bill?" His answer was prompt and unequivocal. He said, in substance: "To tell you the truth, we have nothing to say against the House bill, because the railroads will have to pay comparatively little tax under it."

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to a very remarkable table showing the difference between the revenue-producing qualities of the bill as amended by the Senate committee and the House bill. It also answers conclusively the charge that the Senate bill lets out the big corporations; and, Mr. President, it does what is more important than that, it clinches the position of your committee, namely, that this tax will catch the man or the concern that should be caught, and catch him in a way in which he ought to be caught.

The table (see Table I) to which I call attention is one that does not come from an expert of the department. The data upon which it is based come from a source supposed to have knowledge of the affairs of the corporations with which it deals. The rates given in the table have been worked out or tested by official experts and they can be relied on.

[1] Deficiency.

The table includes over 40 corporations. Some of them are big railroads. Some of them are copper smelting and refining companies. Some of them are steel and iron and chemical companies, representing all sorts of big interests. Let me state the aggregate amount of excess profits, according to the Senate bill, upon the basis of the incomes of 1916. The table gives earnings for 1911–12, and 1913 and 1916. It does not give earnings for 1917, but assumes that the profits will be the same this year as they were in 1916, although, of course, we know they will be very much larger.

There are worked out here the profits for 1911, 1912, and 1913, the basic years, with the profits of 1916, and the total average excess war profits over the average for 1911 to 1913, of these forty-odd corporations. The total amount of excess profits in 1916 made by those corporations is $659,858,490. The aggregate amount of tax they will pay to the Government on such excess war profits under the Senate bill is $240,050,461. Under the House bill the total amount would be $77,736,619.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to just one or two of these companies.

The first is the United States Steel Corporation. I have seen the statement in the papers of my State for several days, coming from high sources, that this corporation will not pay any taxes at all under the Senate bill.

As shown in the above table, the profits of the United States Steel Corporation in 1911 were over $55,000,000; in 1912, over $54,000,000; in 1913, over $81,000,000; in 1916, about $272,000,000. The tax of this corporation under the Senate bill would be $76,726,471; under the House bill, $21,685,000.

The Bethlehem Steel Co. under the House bill would be taxed $7,125,000; under the Senate bill, $25,045,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has had in his hand one table during part of his discussion, and another table during the second part.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is the first table, enlarged at my suggestion.

Mr. POMERENE. It is the same table?

Mr. SIMMONS. The same table, just enlarged so as to show the difference between the House rate and the Senate rate. I have inserted this table as enlarged, Mr. President. I first had it in the small form, and then had it enlarged.

Mr. POMERENE. I should be very glad to have a copy of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The table, as I said, assumes that the incomes of these corporations for 1917 will be the same as in 1916. I have here some data which throw light upon the vast difference between the earnings of these big corporations this year and last year. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to read all of these statements. They are taken from the Wall Street Journal. They are the deductions of that paper, based upon the earnings of these corporations for the first two quarters of the present calendar year.

Mr. GORE. What is the date of the paper?

Mr. SIMMONS. August 1 is the date of one extract, and August 7 the other.

August 7, from the Wall Street Journal:

Bethlehem Steel may have to pay out around 40 per cent of its profits in war taxes this year, on account of the fact that its earnings in 1911 and 1912 and 1913 were comparatively small. In the first half of this year's estimates of profits for Bethlehem Steel after payment of all charges, including preferred-stock dividends, ranged between $90 and $100 a share on class B and class A common stock.

Central Leather: The pronounced strength in Central Leather is a belated recognition of the extraordinary profits this company will realize in 1917. In the six months to June 30 Central Leather earned $24.40 per share on its $39,700,000 common stock, and this $25 per share will be after deduction of the company's estimates for its excess profits tax.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the par value of the shares?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know; this article does not state; $100, I assume.

I will read further:

Good authorities believe that during 1917 Central Leather will earn for its common stock, free and clear of all taxes, a balance of $50.

Midvale Steel: Midvale Steel has followed the example of the big steel corporations, and set up a reserve for the excess profits tax of $4,169,000, at the rate of $18,400,000 per annum. Midvale in its half year has earned for interest, after taxes, depreciation, and estimated Federal excess profits tax allowances, $24,250,000.

The next is Industrial Alcohol, which fares about as well. Wall Street Journal, August 3:

The company has set aside out of the earnings for the first half of 1917 the sum of $1,500,000 as a reserve to cover Federal corporation taxes. Current earnings greatly in excess of those of 1916, when, after increasing property account $13,000,000, there was earned $38 a share on common stock. Surplus, as of December, 1916, was $10,000,000.

American Steel Foundries:

Net earnings for six months June 30—

1914	$242,000
1916	1,374,226

Studebaker: Net profits of corporation for first six months of the year amounted to $2,966,198, after deducting for existing corporation income taxes, but without provision for excess profit tax.

American Tobacco Co., August 9 (including subsidiaries): Sales of American Tobacco Co. for five months ending May 31 were $52,000,000, compared with $42,000,000 for the first five months of 1916. Earnings are showing a gain proportionate with the increase in sales. The company should easily show better than $26 a share for its common this year, compared with $22 in 1916 and $20 in 1915. (This shows heavy increased profits.)

Excerpt from letter addressed to me August 2, 1917, by one of the prominent officials of the American Tobacco Co.:

It has been suggested that I write you frankly and definitely the amount of tax that the American Tobacco Co. will pay as excess profits tax under the scheme shown by the Senate Finance Committee; it has been said that the representation was being made that the American Tobacco Co. would, under the plan of excess profits tax proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, pay nothing in such taxes.

* * * * * * *

I have gone over the figures as best I can. Without attempting to go into detail, I can say to you that the American Tobacco Co. will have to pay taxes under the excess profits tax law reported by the Senate Finance Committee, if such becomes a law, including its direct payment and its proportion of payments by subsidiary companies more than $500,000. I think the figures will much more nearly approximate $750,000.

Mercantile Marine, July 31: It was estimated Mercantile Marine would show net profits of $26,299,000 for 1916 after all war taxes, after interest, and after allowing $4,169,000 for depreciation of steamers.

Corn Products Refining Co., for six months ending June 30.

Profits:

1917	$9,344,000
1916	3,130,000
1915	2,061,000
1914	1,703,000

Saturday, August 11, 1917.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when my remarks upon this bill were suspended yesterday, by the suggestion of adjournment, I was discussing the phenomenal war profits disclosed in the quarterly returns of certain great corporations in this country for the first and second quarters of the present calendar year, as compared with 1916. The figures I then presented showed that though the war profits of these concerns for 1916 were astonishingly large, those for 1917 would so far eclipse them, as forecasted by the returns for the first two quarters, that they would seem small by comparison.

I had shown that the corporations included in the table before referred to made in 1916 war profits on the basis of the Senate committee amendments, of about $660,000,000, and would pay a war tax, under these amendments, of about $240,000,000 in round figures, as against $77,736,000 under the bill as it passed the House.

The net profits of the United States Steel Corporation shown by its statement for 1916 amounted to $271,000,000, and its war tax for that year under the Senate committee bill would be $76,000,000, or about as much as would be paid by all the forty-odd companies to which I have referred, under the House plan for that year.

That is to say, Mr. President, according to the table I have presented to the Senate, the United States Steel Corporation's taxes under the Senate committee bill would be within a million dollars as much as the combined taxes of all the 48 corporations named in the table, including the Steel Corporation, under the House plan.

I wish now to supplement that statement by reading to the Senate a part of an article from the Wall Street Journal of August 2 on the operation of the United States Steel Corporation for the first and second quarters of this year. I do this for the purpose of showing that while the war profits of 1916 were startlingly great they were nothing like what we may expect during future war years. Let me read to the Senate.

I am quoting from the Wall Street Journal of August 2, 1917:

> The allowance of $53,918,872 for war income and excess profits taxes made by United States Steel in the second quarter is much larger than recent Wall Street estimates, but this is due largely to the fact that earnings, not deducting taxes, in the second quarter were at the rate of nearly $578,000,000 annually and earnings to which the tax is applicable were at the rate of over $490,000,000 annually.

Their earnings for 1916 subject to the tax were, as I now recall, $207,945,953. According to the Wall Street Journal, based upon the returns of the second quarter, the earnings of this corporation in 1917 subject to the tax will be $490,000,000.

The Wall Street Journal further says:

> United States Steel in the second quarter deducted at the rate of $215,675,488 annually for war taxes. The tax of $53,918,872 for the second quarter is at the rate of approximately 44 per cent on a balance of $122,792,408, after all deductions before dividends and before deducting the excess profits tax. The $122,792,408 in the second quarter is the balance to which the excess profits tax applies.
> After preferred dividends United States Steel reported a balance in the second quarter of $62,568,617 available for the common stock, equal to about $12.50 a share. This is at the rate of $49.20 a share annually, and is a remarkably good showing when it is considered that the corporation in the second quarter deducted for war taxes a total equal to an annual rate of over $42 a share on the common stock.

So that after paying dividends upon the preferred stock and all the taxes for that quarter there will be left for a dividend to the common stockholder for that quarter $12.50, equal to an annual dividend of $50 a share, after the payment of everything.

Mr. HOLLIS. Before the Senator leaves that——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not finished reading.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to make a remark before the Senator leaves the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I read further from the same article. I am not reading it all because of its length:

> In the first half of the current year the United States Steel Corporation deducted from earnings in connection with war and excess-profit taxes nearly $100,000,000. This is at the rate of close to $200,000,000 a year, or approximately 15 per cent of the total amount the Government expected to raise annually on a basis of the revenue bill as it now stands.
> The original statement of the United States Steel Corporation for the first quarter did not give the amount of the war tax deducted, but it was probably based upon the tax then proposed of 16 per cent in excess of 8 per cent.
> This was based upon the rate and plan of the House bill.
> This would mean that there was deducted from earnings, as per the original first quarterly report, close to $10,000,000.

In other words, the amount they estimated at the time for the first quarter as necessary to meet the war profits tax was $10,000,000, calculated on the basis of the House bill. The article proceeds:

> This, added to the additional allowance of $33,865,000 for war taxes in the first quarter, makes total war taxes in the first quarter $43,865,000.

That is to say, when they revised their original deduction from the earnings on the first quarter, for this tax, they added to the $10,000,000 originally taken out to meet the requirements of the House bill $33,000,000 more, as made necessary by the higher rate, and the plan, of the Senate committee bill. I read again:

> This, added to the additional allowance of $33,865,000 for war taxes in the first quarter, makes total war taxes in the first quarter $43,865,000, compared with $53,918,872 in the second quarter, a total for the first half of the year of $97,783,872.

This shows, Mr. President, that as against $271,000,000 war profits in 1916 it is estimated that the war profits of this great corporation for 1917 will reach $490,000,000, or nearly double that for 1916. It also shows that in the first quarter of 1917 this company set aside about $10,000,000 for war taxes on the basis of the House bill, but subsequently added $33,000,000 because of the changed basis of the Senate committee amendments.

But more important still, this shows that in the first of the two quarters of 1917, after paying dividends on preferred stock and war taxes, there will remain a balance sufficient to pay dividends on the common stock for the quarter of $12.50 per share, or an annual dividend of $50 a share.

Mr. President, I have taken the time of the Senate to present these facts with reference to this great corporation in full, because it establishes beyond controversy that the bill as applied to this corporation and to those in its class—and there are a great many in its class with reference to profit, though none in its class with reference to size of capitalization and business—will do exactly what the Senate committee contends that it will do, exactly what in the framing of the bill they believed and intended it would do. It will so reach them as to require them to pay in proportion to the increase in their profits resulting from the war and to continue paying according as their profits increase. This, we thought, was very desirable. Clearly such is the case here. As indicated, the profits of this corporation last year were abnormally high, phenomenally high—unlike anything before experienced in this country. However, high as their profits were and large as their net earnings were, they would only have had to pay, under our bill on the basis of 1916 earnings, a tax of $76,000,000. This year it is certain their profits will have almost doubled, and so their taxes will be approximately twice this amount.

But it shows another thing, Mr. President, which is equally important. A system levying high taxes for the purpose of getting revenue and taking no account of the effect of those taxes upon the industries from which they are to be withdrawn, would be very unjust. But the facts in this case illustrate that under these conditions the heavy tax can be paid and yet leave to the taxpayer a profit which neither the owners of that great industry, nor the most optimistic financiers in this country have heretofore thought possible. After they have paid this Government tax, all other taxes—all other obligations, including the dividends upon preferred stock, according to the figures taken from this representative financial publication—there will be left to the stockholder of the common stock of this corporation $12.50 quarterly, or at the rate of $50 per share for the year.

Mr. STERLING. Of $100.

Mr. SIMMONS. On $100 par value.

Mr. HOLLIS. And a large part watered.

Mr. SIMMONS. And, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] very properly says, it is a fact well known to everybody that a large part of the stock of this particular corporation is not represented by actually invested capital, but is watered. Who can successfully attack the wisdom or the equity of a bill, certainly as applied to this class of corporations, which while it brings to the Government a tax of 44 per cent upon the profits, leaves to the common stockholders—and they are the owners of the property—after all expenses and all taxes have been paid, a net return of $50 a share upon stock that represents probably much less than $50 of actual investment?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. Would it trouble the Senator if I reminded him that the net earnings of the United States Steel Corporation for 1916, which were, as the Senator has already stated, $271,000,000, were in excess of the total amount that the corporation paid to everyone to work for it, including the laborers, office force, salaried officers, and managers?

Mr. SIMMONS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President. I have not singled out this corporation for any invidious reason. I have simply singled it out as one of a class of at least 20 of the great corporations named in the schedule in this table, and with a view to further answering an argument that is sometimes made: First, that this tax will not adequately reach these big corporations; and another, per contra, that the bill will severely and unjustly cripple them and make the levy excessive as against them.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. Just one question. Has the Senator any data showing whether the stock of the United States Steel is largely held by capitalists, or is it very generally distributed among the public?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am unable to answer that question. I have not looked into that phase of the subject.

Mr. President, as appropriate to this argument I desire to direct attention to the following excerpt from a letter written by the manager of one of the important cotton mills in North Carolina to the manager of another North Carolina cotton mill in reply to a letter protesting the Senate scheme and rates. It says:

The strongest argument confronting us is the enormous amount of money the Senate bill will get out of the munition factories and kindred industries. This makes the law popular, and when we consider the great profits being made by those companies directly out of the war, we are forced to conclude that there is some justification for the popularity. For illustrative purposes I give you the following:

Company.	Net profits.	Tax due.	Per cent of profits.
United States Steel	$430,000,000	$148,068,000	35
Bethlehem Steel	48,000,000	17,036,000	35
Lackawanna Steel	25,000,000	8,786,000	35
American Locomotive	7,250,000	432,000	6
Baldwin Locomotive	6,400,000	334,000	5

These figures were taken from the Wall Street Journal, and the detailed calculations are printed. In addition to this the profits of the Du Pont, Hercules, and Atlas Powder Cos. are estimated at $101,612,000. Their total excess profits tax amounts to $38,000,000, or 37 per cent of their net profits. To this must be further added the amounts to be received from the independent powder companies, including the American Powder Mills, the shell, ammunition, and small-arms manufacturers, such as Winchester Repeating Arms Co., Remington U. M. C. Co., Peters Cartridge Co., Western Cartridge Co., United States Cartridge Co., etc. It is estimated that 33⅓ per cent of the entire revenue collected under the Senate bill will be derived from what we understand as munition industries. Under the House bill they will pay, after adding 12½ per cent now specifically imposed, about one-half as much as under the Senate bill. As above stated the United States Steel Co. will pay under the Senate bill $148,000,000. It is a fact that eight munition plants alone will raise as much under the Senate bill as the entire House bill will raise. From this it would appear that the rates imposed under the House bill can only be temporary, and would necessarily have to be raised as additional funds are required. With reference to the flat-rate tax a very careful investigation has been made and it is estimated that it will require in the neighborhood of 25 per cent of the net earnings of all the corporations in this country to raise as much revenue as the Senate bill.

I stated yesterday, Mr. President, that my understanding was that under the bill as passed by the House practically all the railroads of the country would escape the operation of this tax. I stated that I had that information directly from one of the leading representatives of these corporations here at Washington. In fact, I believe the gentleman I referred to is the Washington representative of all the railroads.

I have here a statement from the Interstate Commerce Commission which has been furnished me and which contains certain data explaining why the railroads would escape this tax under the bill as passed by the House. According to these figures, based upon the annual earnings of all the railroads in this country, where their earnings were in excess of $1,000,000 prior to the war, the average net earnings were between 4 and 5 per cent. During one period the average was about 4 per cent; in the other period about 5 per cent. That was prior to the war.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator please state what years comprise these periods?

Mr. SIMMONS. This is an analysis of operating incomes of railways in the United States from July 1, 1890, to June 30, 1915, published by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It gives a comparison of such incomes per mile of road together with the book cost per mile.

For the years 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, and 1915 the average was 4.56 per cent. That was for the last five years, from 1911 to 1915, inclusive. Four and fifty-six one-hundredths per cent was the total amount of the profits of the railroads of the country, as ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission and as stated in its report. The House bill under its 8 per cent exemption provision permits the railroads of the country, therefore, before any of their income becomes subject to a tax at all to have an exemption almost twice as great as their actual earnings; in other words, it attempts arbitrarily to raise, and does in fact arbitrarily raise the earnings for the purpose of this tax of the railroads of this country from about 4½ per cent to 8 per cent for the purposes of this exemption. Although the roads are making very considerably more now—though not realizing the benefit of war conditions, as are the industrial corporations, because they are not permitted to fix their prices as are industrial corporations—their profits have increased solely by reason of the increase in the volume of the business of this country. Before they became subject to any tax under the House bill they would have to earn, in the taxable year, about 100 per cent more than they earned during the prewar period.

I presented yesterday, Mr. President, data which show that of the eleven European nations which have adopted a war-profits tax, all of them except one, namely, Spain, have adopted the same plan now proposed with reference to selecting certain test years for ascertaining actual prewar profits. Of course they differ as to the number of years; some of them taking three years, as we do, some of them two out of three years, and some of them three out of five years; but all except one adopt the same method that we do. I intended also to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that of the nations of Europe adopting a war-profits tax a majority not only practically adopted the same prewar test period as we, but they also adopted a graduated scheme of levying these taxes as against a flat-rate scheme. Three leading countries of Europe have adopted the flat rate—Great Britain, France, and, I think, also Germany; but it is evident that at the outset, not to say anything of later increases, the rate of tax imposed by at least two of these three countries was so high that there was no margin left for graduating the tax. France at first had a graduated tax, but increased all the lower rates of that tax to a flat rate of 50 per cent.

I will insert at this point fuller data regarding the practice of foreign countries in this connection.

The countries that have a percentage basis for computing excess profits are Spain and Canada.

Those that have as a basis for excess profits the excess over the average of certain prewar years are:

Great Britain, 2 of the 3 prewar years.
France, the 3 prewar years.
Italy, 2 years, 1913–14.
Russia, the 2 prewar years.
Germany, 3 of 5 prewar years excluding best and worst years.
Austria (business), 3 of 5 prewar years excluding best and worst year.
Austria (individual), year 1913 or years 1911, 1912, and 1913.
Denmark, 2 of 3 years, 1912–13, 1913–14, and 1914–15.
Norway, 2 years, 1912–13 and 1913–14.
Sweden, 2 years, 1913 and 1914.
Holland, 3 years, 1911, 1912, and 1913.

The countries having a graduated excess profits tax law are:

Italy, 10 to 30 per cent of excess profits.
Russia, 20 to 40 per cent of excess profits.
Canada, 25 to 75 per cent of excess profits.
Austria (business), 10 to 40 per cent of excess profits.
Austria (individual), 5 to 45 per cent of excess profits.
Denmark, 1 to 25 per cent of taxable income.
Norway, 5 to 20 per cent of taxable income.
Sweden, 12 to 18 per cent of taxable income.
Spain, 25 to 40 per cent of income in excess of fixed percentages of capital invested.

Countries that provide for subnormal business:

Great Britain, 6 and 7 per cent of capital invested.
France, 6 per cent on capital invested.
Italy, 8 per cent on capital invested.
Russia, 8 per cent on capital invested.
Germany, 5 per cent on capital invested.
Austria, 6 per cent on capital invested.
Denmark, 5 per cent on capital invested.
Sweden, 5 per cent on capital invested.
Holland, 5 per cent on capital invested.
Canada, 7 and 10 per cent of capital invested.
Spain, 7 per cent on capital invested.

Practically every one of these nations has adopted a scheme to take care of the subnormal profits during the test years; not always the same scheme that we have adopted, but one that recognized the principle of taking care of the concern with subnormal profits during that period. Generally where profits were subnormal they have allowed a flat exemption of from 5 to 7 per cent. I think the average will probably run about 6 per cent. They have not in any case, as is contended by some of the adversaries of the Senate committee plan, provided for what may be called a supernormal profit; that is to say, where the industry prior to the war was making not a low profit but a high profit as compared with other industries, they have not denied that fortunate individual or concern the benefit, for the purpose of exemption, of the actual profits.

There is a vast difference, I wish to say, between extending grace to a man who has been unfortunate in business, and who has not been able to make the average rate of profits obtaining in his line of industry and the case of the man who has enjoyed an excess. No injustice is done by this act of leniency on the part of the Government to anybody; but if, on the other hand, we say to the man "in estimating your war profits, which we propose to tax heavily, you shall be required to surrender for the purposes of your exemption a part of your actual profits, because they happen to be a little higher than your neighbor's profits, because they happen to be a little higher than the average profits of those in your industry"; if we so treated him, we should be denying him a right growing out of the very principle of the tax, for it can not be a war tax unless it is based upon the excess of the war profits over those of peace times, or upon normal experience. We have adopted here the rule of actual earnings during the test period. The point I am making is that without injustice to anybody you may raise to the level of representative concerns the peace profits of the man who was unfortunate and who made a subnormal profit; you do no wrong; you violate no principle of morals or of equity; but if you undertake to prescribe the same principle to the prewar supernormal profits and deny the taxpayer the benefit of his actual prewar earnings, you do an act that is not only wrong but, it seems to me, one which is utterly in violation of the fundamental principles of this bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me merely for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to hear a little further from the Senator from North Carolina relative to the flat rate upon the excess war profits, and why the committee decided upon this graduated rate or scale of taxation on this excess.

I want to say to the Senator that the flat rate for excess war profits has appealed to me as a just rate. It is really the basis of all taxation. Either there is by law a fixed rate of taxation upon the property of everybody or a rate ascertained by dividing the assessed valuation into the amount of taxes to be raised under all systems.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I went into that yesterday, I think, pretty fully. I would not like to go over that ground again; but I can say to the Senator in a sentence what I think governed. We adopted a graduated rate because a flat rate would have imposed the same per cent of taxation upon a profit of 500 per cent as it would upon a profit of 10 per cent in excess of the normal, and besides you consider the question of the relative ability to pay without working hardship. We thought you should consider in the levying of this war tax, first, the amount of the profit increase and then levy your tax in proportion to such increase. A flat rate rests much heavier upon concerns making small war profits and much lighter upon those making large war profits than does the graduated tax.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; but——

Mr. SIMMONS. By the graduated plan we get from the man who makes very large profits a larger proportionate amount than you get from the man who makes a very small profit.

Mr. STERLING. And yet I can see no difference in principle between a tax on excess war profits and a tax upon property or upon income. It is all according to a fixed, flat rate, as the Senator terms it.

Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I was very much attracted to an article—and I suppose the Senator has read that article, as other Senators have—in the Review of Reviews, entitled "War Profits to Pay for the War."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish the Senator would put it in the RECORD and not consume my time.

Mr. STERLING. I did not desire to put the entire article in the RECORD. It may have been put in the RECORD two or three times already, and hence I have been a little diffident about presenting it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can put any part of it in the RECORD in my remarks if he so desires.

Mr. STERLING. Very well, I will ask at this point that an extract from the article referred to be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the extract from the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The extract referred to is as follows:

[Extract from reprint from July, 1917, Review of Reviews.]

WAR PROFITS TO PAY FOR THE WAR.

Mr. Otto Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., one of those farsighted leaders of "big business," who are asking that the Government should come to them and take the money which ought to pay for the war—assumes that for the year 1917 there will be war-stimulated profits in excess of the average profits of the three years preceding our entry into the conflict amounting to $2,000,000,000.

He advocates a 40 per cent tax on this excess. The resulting $800,000,000 can be taken without one-hundredth part of the hardship that would be caused by a typical device for raising one-fortieth of that sum in the bill passed by the House of Representatives.

Heads of the other very largest groups of business and financial interests admit the righteousness, expediency, and effectiveness of such a tax and advocate it. A representative of very large interests suggests a rate of 40 per cent the first year, 60 per cent the second, and 80 per cent the third year, if the war should last so long.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the Senator ought, under these circumstances, to expect me to stop and listen to the reading of an article that has been published in the RECORD several times. I am perfectly willing that it should go in, however.

Mr. President, there are certain other objections which have been made to the war-profits tax to which I wish to advert for a few minutes. Very strenuous objection has been made from some sources to the action of the Senate which includes individuals within the scope of this tax. There were quite a number of reasons that moved the committee to take this action. In the first place, your committee wanted to make this war tax as all embracing as possible. It felt that this was the one tax that would have to be paid only in proportion to the extent to which the taxpayer had been benefited by the war. We thought that anybody who out of this great disaster was so fortunate as to reap some special financial benefit ought to be willing to contribute some portion of that benefit to help a burdened people to defray its expenses. Therefore, we thought that, after the House had included partnerships, it was but right and proper that the individual should also be included. The individual frequently is engaged in the same character of business as the corporation or the copartnership. In many instances his profits are the same as those of the copartnership and those of the average corporation as the result of the war. Very frequently the individual and the partnership are doing the same kind of business, with the same amount of capital, subject to the same business conditions, and making like profits out of this war. We could not see why the copartnership should be required to pay on its war profits under these conditions and the individual should not.

In addition to that, Mr. President, under the present income-tax law as it has existed since 1913, as it was written in the tariff act of that year and as it has been brought forward through various amendments in the revenue bills which we have passed since then—in all of this scheme of taxation imposing taxes upon the normal incomes of the people, the individual is included as well as the corporation. If the individual is required, along with the corporation, to pay a profits tax in times of peace based upon his normal earnings, upon what ground should he be exempt in times of war from paying a tax upon his special war profits, just as the corporation and the copartnership are required to do?

Of course, if it could be shown that there was a differentiation in the profits which the individual made and the profits made by the average corporation and copartnership, that might have some effect; but, Mr. President, it is a well-recognized fact that while there is a class of corporations reaping infinitely greater profits out of this condition than others, the whole people engaged in business, irrespective of the character of that business, speaking broadly and generally, are to a greater or less extent participating in the benefit of the enlarged profits accruing from war conditions.

By including individuals we have greatly broadened the system of excess profits taxation. We have brought it up to and put it upon a parity with our great system of income taxes. We have extended it so as to embrace in its all-sweeping provisions all the war profits made by the skill, the energy, and the industry of all the people in this country who are making war profits. We have made it as broad and as comprehensive as the activities of the country. We have not only required that every man who makes war profits shall contribute a part of them to the Government to pay the burdens of the war, but we have given everybody who is making excessive profits out of the misfortunes of his country an opportunity to contribute to the carrying of the burdens which have been imposed upon his fellow man as the result of the thing out of which he is reaping his harvest of gold.

But objection has come from some quarters that we ought not to include the individual because, forsooth, it will take in the farmers of the country, and, for some mysterious reason, there seems to be on the part of some an idea that the farmer should not be treated as other individuals. Mr. President, I am a farmer; practically all that I own is invested in farms; I am a son of a farmer; all of my ancestors on both sides have been farmers as far back as memory takes us. No man has greater sympathy with the farmers of this country than I have, and yet, Mr. President, I know that the farmers of this country are reaping as a result of these conditions a rich harvest of gold. I know they are making profits such as they never thought of in their most optimistic dreams. Why should not the farmer be included? Is the farmer exempt from our income tax?

We have been taxing our people for the last four or five years at a pretty lively rate upon their incomes. Nobody has suggested up to this time that the farmers of the country shall be exempt from these income taxes based upon their peace-time profits. Nobody is asking now that the farmer be exempt from those income taxes. If the farmer should be required to pay a tax upon his earnings in peace times, why should he be exempt from the requirement that all should pay a tax upon special war profits? If he ought to pay taxes upon his peace-time profits, the stronger the reason why he should pay a tax upon his war-time profits.

To say that some countries of Europe, small in a territorial sense, have exempted the farmers is beside the question when you consider the difference between the conditions which obtained there at the beginning of the war, when these exemptions were made, and the conditions which obtain here. England is not an agricultural country. The farmers of that country contribute but a mite to supplying the people of those islands with food. A condition was brought about there that required that every possible stimulation should be given to the little agriculture that existed. For the purpose of that stimulation they allowed them an exemption. But in this broad land of ours we not only make all agricultural products we need for our own consumption, but enough to feed a goodly portion of the remainder of the world. The splendid prices that now obtain for agricultural products in this country are sufficient stimulation, and if they continue at the present rate there is no question about the ability and purpose of the American farmer to supply our wants and those of our allies.

But, Mr. President, this demand for the exclusion of the farmer, I am glad to say, has not come to me from the farmer. I do not think he is asking for any such exemption. Neither do I believe that the individual, as disinguished from the corporation and the partnership, is asking for any exemption from this tax.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether the Senator from North Dakota thinks that the farmer ought to be exempted or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think the farmers ought to be exempted, and I do not know of any instance where the farmers were exempt; but that was not the question I wanted to ask. The Senator has dwelt at some considerable length upon the phase of this question that the farmers are willing to pay their share of the taxes, and I believe he is right; but has the Senator taken into consideration this phase of the matter—that we have recently passed legislation which to a certain extent will control the farmer's profits?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator ask if I have taken that into consideration?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; or if the committee has taken it into consideration?

Mr. SIMMONS. That legislation has been passed since the committee acted, but I think the committee anticipated it. I wish to say to the Senator that while, of course, if farm prices in this country or any other prices go to a point where the average man can not buy the necessaries of life, I think they will be controlled and ought to be controlled. I have no idea that there is any purpose on the part of the Government to cut down farm prices so low that there will not be an enormous war profit as compared with the peace profit of the farmer. I think that probably is also true with reference to wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the Senator knows that it would be necessary to classify the farmers. I do not think the Senator could, upon the broad statement and by simply mentioning the farmers, regulate the profits according to the laws which have recently been passed. For instance, the cotton farmers have not been restricted. I am just mentioning this because it is a fact.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator that in the committee neither I nor any other member of the committee was trying to get an advantage for any product of our States.

Mr. GRONNA. No; I believe that, but I am simply stating facts. In the food bill which was passed a few days ago the cotton farmer was eliminated from the restrictions in the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would not have been a bad thing for the cotton farmer if he had been taken in and given a minimum in proportion to that given to the wheat farmer, but I do not think it would have been good or wise legislation for the country.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator knows that the people of the South almost unanimously protested against being included in the bill. We had resolutions here by the hundreds.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think they ought to have been included. I think the only things that ought to have been included were included.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I know of no grain farmer asking to be included, either.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire to enter into that discussion with the Senator. I know that he always rallies to the defense when he thinks that anything is done that might affect the profits of the producers of certain products.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may say just a word in that connection, I recognize the fact that there is always a disposition in certain localities and by certain men to get certain advantages for those localities. I gave some figures here the other day with respect to wheat raisers. I am just as much interested in the farmer and his rights and his privileges and his duties as any other man. The Congress, in its wisdom, fixed the minimum price of wheat at $2 per bushel. That is a guaranty to every farmer of $2 wheat as a minimum, and every farmer ought to be satisfied with that. In my own State, where data were gathered by the president of the agricultural board, I showed here that the average minimum price which they asked was $1.49, and the average maximum price which they asked was $2.10½. Now, it does seem to me that the farmers generally are very well satisfied—I know they are—as far as the wheat proposition is concerned.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thank the Senator for his very clear statement.

Mr. PAGE. Has it ever been urged that the farmer was not a good enough bookkeeper to be able to arrive at the necessary figures?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I have heard that argument. That is a mere matter of administration, and I do not think there is enough in that to determine the question. That is a mere matter of convenience, a mere matter of a little expense of keeping accounts. I do not think there is enough in it to affect the broad principle that is involved in the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me just a moment, so that the farmers of the country may not be misled in the idea that they have a guarantee that their next year's crop will bring a minimum of $2 per bushel. There is no obligation in the bill upon the President or upon anyone else to guarantee that they will receive that sum, as I recall the provisions of the bill. The bill, for the purpose of encouraging the production of grain, provides that the President may—not that he must, but if the conditions warrant, he may—for the purpose of securing the sowing of a proper proportion of wheat, make a guarantee; and in case he does so guarantee, the price shall not be less than $2 a bushel.

I want to say further, in reference to that, because there has been some contrary statement made on the subject, that I think the provisions of the bill are most fair and generous to the wheat-raising farmers of the Northwest. It is a minimum price, and not a maximum price that has been fixed in this bill.

If the conditions of supply and demand warrant a greater price, they will receive it. If the conditions do not warrant even that price, and the President sees fit to make this guarantee, he will make it under certain conditions which the farmer must agree to follow, and they will at least receive that amount per bushel. That was one of the reasons that governed me in voting for the food bill—that the people of my State were well protected under the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to add in connection with that subject only the statement that under the present income-tax law an exemption is permitted the individual. Under the present law the exemption is $4,000 for a married man and $3,000 for a man not married nor the head of a family. In the bill as reported, the income-tax exemptions for individuals are still retained, though the amounts are reduced. That is a discrimination which the present law makes in favor of the individual with reference to income tax. Your committee, in proposing to include the individual in the war excess profit tax, extended to him a like exemption, but more in amount. That is, we allowed the individual a flat exemption of $5,000. The farmer or any other individual who is engaged in business, before he will have to pay any tax at all under this provision of the law, will be allowed first to deduct an amount equal to his average earnings during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and in addition to that he will be permitted, before he is required to pay any tax at all, to deduct $5,000 from his war profits.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. BRADY. If the Senator will permit an interruption which I think will be beneficial here, I fear I misunderstood the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. Did I understand him to say that there was no definite guarantee of $2 a bushel for the wheat produced in 1918?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is not, Mr. President.

Mr. BRADY. On page 10 of the bill that I have before me, it speaks of the regulations under the bill, and then it says:

> In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 Northern Spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but I do not understand, Mr. President, that that changes the right of the President to determine whether or not he will give that encouragement. He may do this for the purpose of encouraging the production of wheat, and if he does do that for the purpose of encouraging the production the price which is fixed shall not be less than $2. That is my understanding of the bill, taking it altogether.

Mr. BRADY. My understanding, and I am inclined to think it is the understanding of the farmers of this country, is that we have given a definite guaranty of $2 a bushel for the production of wheat in 1918.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Just one sentence. I will say that it was the intention of the Senate, I am certain, and the intention of the committee—the question was raised in the conference committee—that this guaranty of $2 a bushel for the crop of 1918 should be absolute, the guaranty of a minimum price not to be less than $2 per bushel. It is not contingent on anybody's will or on anybody's action. The President could fix a higher minimum price than $2, but he could not fix a less price than that, and that price is fixed without any action whatever on the part of the President. That was the purpose of the committee.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRADY. With the permission of the chairman I will say that I am very glad indeed to hear the statement made by the chairman of the committee. I attended every meeting of the committee, and we discussed the matter very thoroughly, and my understanding was then and is now that we gave to the farmers of this country an absolute unqualified guaranty of $2 a bushel for the wheat that they raise in 1918. If we have not done so we have not carried out the purpose of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish briefly to state to the Senate the changes made by the committee in the title of the bill relating to intoxicating beverages. In the bill as first reported to the Senate your committee accepted practically all of the House rates imposed in the title. The changes now made in the bill are largely due to changed conditions since the bill was first reported.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator, before he passes from this question of the exemption of $5,000, whether that applies to individuals other than farmers or is limited to farmers?

Mr. SIMMONS. It applies to all individuals who are subject to the war-profits tax.

Mr. FLETCHER. First you deduct an average—

Mr. SIMMONS. His average earnings during the three years before the war, the three test years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; and then you add to that $5,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And that is exempt. It applies not only to farmers, but to other individuals as well?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and under another provision of this bill, if any individual or corporation, or copartnership, made during those test years a profit that was low as compared with the profits in like business, and the Secretary of the Treasury, upon complaint, should find that to be a fact, this bill will permit that unfortunate individual, whether a farmer or a merchant or a manufacturer, to have an exemption equal practically to the average profits during those years of representative concerns engaged in the same line of business.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see. That is intended to cover any case of accident or misfortune that may have happened during those years?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; so that the Senator will readily see that the man who made a subnormal profit while his neighbor was making a normal profit during these prewar years, through the operations and application of this provision of the bill, will be enabled, in the average that he will be allowed, to get the benefit of the standard earnings of others engaged in like business. I thank the Senator for interrupting me, because it has enabled me to make a statement with reference to the section of the bill relating to subnormal profits that I had omitted to make, and which I think ought to have been made.

Mr. President, the changes made in the rates with reference to intoxicating drinks, after the bill was recommitted, from the original rates proposed as the bill was first reported to the Senate, resulted first from the passage of the food-control bill, containing, as everybody knows, certain provisions affecting both the business of manufacturing liquor and the business of brewing beer. Secondly, we made the changes because of the necessity of raising a larger amount of money through taxation—a necessity that seemed to be created by a situation that was brought to the attention of the committee after the bill had been recommitted and which was not fully known to the committee when it acted in the first instance. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, the prohibition of the manufacture of spirits for beverage purposes, and the commandeering powers of the President given in the food-control bill, will give to the owners of distilled spirits now in bond and in stock a practical monopoly of the market, and as a result the prices of such spirits will be greatly increased. This, together with the revenue needs of the Government, your committee thinks, justifies the additional $1 tax that it is proposed to impose upon this product. I do not feel that subject requires any elaboration. I think the statement is sufficient.

With the limitations of the stock of distilled spirits it is believed by your committee that there would be a greatly enlarged demand both for beer and for wine and that a higher tax should be levied upon these products.

The food-control bill does not permit the further manufacture of grape spirits or brandy except for the purpose of fortifying wines. A part of the wines of this country is now of necessity fortified with grape brandy. Another part is fortified with distilled grain spirits or alcohol. The law permits the fortification of wines to the extent of 24 per cent alcohol. That is to say, if they contain more than 24 per cent alcohol they are not taxed as wines; they are then taxed as spirits.

Under the present law grape brandy, used in the fortification of sweet wines—the only kind that requires fortification—is practically exempt from taxation. Up to the time of the passage of the present tariff act this material was taxed at only 3 cents a proof gallon. Under the present law it is taxed at only 10 cents a proof gallon. Under the bill as it came from the House it is proposed to increase this tax only by doubling it, making it 20 cents a gallon.

There are two classes of sweet wines made in this country. One, it is claimed, cannot, without injury to its flavor, be fortified with this grape brandy. It is necessary to use in the fortification of this wine distilled grain spirits, taxed under the present law at $1.10 a gallon and $2.20 total tax under the bill as passed by the House. It is proposed in the Senate committee amendment to add $1 to that, making the total tax $3.20 a proof gallon.

Mr. President, if grape brandy is to remain taxed as provided in the bill as passed by the House at 20 cents, and if the tax in the House bill on distilled spirits is to remain, it is evident that that class of wine makers who use grape brandy in fortifying their wine—the California wine makers use it altogether—will have a very great advantage over the wine maker who has to use highly taxed distilled spirits.

In view of the restriction imposed upon the manufacture of liquor as a beverage, which limits the entire consumption in this country from now to the close of the war to the present stock on hand, thereby greatly increasing the demand for beers and wines, especially wines containing a large amount—as much as 24 per cent—of alcohol, with consequent increase of price, your committee believed that it would be no hardship to add to the tax imposed upon the product constituting the chief material used in the fortification of probably over 75 per cent of all the sweet wines used in this country.

But when we came to deal with that class of wines which are produced principally from partially fermented grape juice containing, naturally, a small per cent of alcohol, probably not over 6 per cent, and which requires the addition of grape brandy for the purpose of preserving the sugar and for fortification—the law allowing the addition of enough of this brandy to bring its alcoholic contents to 24 per cent, and still retain its character as wine—the committee concluded, because of the fact that such wine is an alcoholic drink, that it contains four, yea, six times as much alcohol as beer, and, because of its high alcoholic content, will become a popular drink when stronger drinks are unobtainable, that this wine was a legitimate subject for the higher tax imposed upon distilled spirits.

Your committee decided, therefore, to change the method of taxing this wine by substituting an additional tax of $1.10 per proof gallon. The present tax is 10 cents per gallon on wines containing not more than 21 per cent of alcohol, and 25 cents per gallon on wine containing 21 per cent and not more than 24 per cent of alcohol.

There is another class of wines made from grapes grown east of the Rocky Mountains. The juice of these grapes, low in sugar, after complete fermentation and the addition of cane sugar, is fortified with grain spirits. The spirits so used will pay a tax of $3.20 per proof gallon under our bill. We have doubled the existing tax upon this wine, making it 20 cents and 50 cents per gallon, depending upon its alcoholic strength.

We feel fully justified in placing the high taxes on sweet wines fortified with grape brandy, as, lacking distilled spirits, they will be used in substitution.

I insert here Table II, showing the present and the proposed taxes under this schedule.

The table referred to is as follows:

We made some other changes in the schedule with reference to champagne and other sparkling wines and things of that sort, doubling the House rates, but I do not think it is necessary for me to take up the time of the Senate in discussing them.

Mr. President, just a word with reference to our changes in the tobacco schedule. The Senate committee has only slightly changed that schedule. It has somewhat reduced the rates and changed the classifications in the bill as passed by the House. These changes do not reduce the revenues, but slightly increase them. The tax imposed in the House, except upon cigars, just doubled the present tax. The rates imposed by the Senate committee increases the present rates on an average about 60 per cent. The department, through its experts and other sources of communication, was strongly of the opinion that this tax as imposed by the House was too high for revenue purposes—that more revenue would be secured from this source by a less tax than by the high rate levied in the bill as passed by the House.

I have here the original estimates, made by the department and sent to the Finance Committee, and also to the Ways and Means Committee, of the amount of revenue the Government would receive by doubling the tax on tobacco products.

According to this statement the receipts from cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco for the last fiscal year were $94,000,000, and it is estimated if the tax were doubled the additional receipts from these sources would only be $53,000,000.

It will be seen from this statement that the department estimates that doubling the tax on tobacco and its products will increase the present revenue by only 50 per cent. That can mean but one thing, namely, that the Government maintains that this would result in the increase falling off in tobacco consumption, and that is the explanation given to your committee. In other words, the department held that the House rate is not a good revenue rate.

If it be true that doubling the tax will result in reducing consumption without yielding more revenue than the rate proposed in the Senate amendments and approved by the department, namely, 60 per cent, it is manifest that the higher rate would not benefit the Government because there would be no increased revenue, while it would injuriously affect the manufacturer by curtailing consumption and reducing the amount of his sales. It would likewise be hurtful to the tobacco farmer by curtailing the market for his product. The sum of the whole matter would be that nobody would be benefited and that the consumer of tobacco would have to pay a higher price for his tobacco without benefit to anyone.

According to the estimate of the department sent to the Finance Committee we shall receive about $1,000,000 more from this source under the 60 per cent increase than we should have received under the rate imposed by the House that doubled all these taxes.

There are other sections of the bill I had intended to comment upon, but it must be evident to the Senate that I am too wearied to longer continue this discussion.

With some few general observations I shall conclude.

If I were against this war, if I were out of sympathy with its objects so far as we are concerned, if I thought it were an unholy war, if I did not feel that it involved the broad question of liberty and humanity here and everywhere, if I thought the situation involved no danger to my country in the present or the future, I might feel differently about these taxes and the great burdens they will necessarily impose upon the people. I might feel differently about certain suggested exemptions, to which I have referred, if proposed under other circumstances; but I believe we are engaged in a righteous war, a war of defense forced upon us by acts of outrage and aggression to which we could not tamely submit.

I believe by every consideration of national honor and safety we are called upon to meet this condition by war. I know money is as essential to the successful prosecution of this war as soldiers are, for with money we must equip and feed our armies and navies and assist our allies. I believe as a matter of duty and patriotism all our people should support the war according to their varying abilities. I believe that every man who loves his country will willingly, yea gladly, contribute to its support.

I know, Mr. President, that there are some, not many I hope, who will wish and seek to escape their just contribution. These few are the men—

> With souls so dead,
> Who never to themselves hath said,
> This is my own, my native land!

They are the few to whom home and native land have but little meaning. They are the few to whom this war means nothing more than a golden opportunity to profiteer on the necessities of a burdened people, to pile up riches and satisfy their greed, or to minister to their thirst for indulgence or for power.

We are told that we must not include individuals in the war-profit tax—that at any rate the farmer should be exempt from these taxes.

I do not believe those who make these statements are authorized to speak for the individual or the farmer. I do not believe that the farmer or the individual whatever may be his calling in this country is asking for any exemption. Have they said to us "Out of our war prosperity we are unwilling to contribute to feed, to clothe, and to pay the meager salaries of the brave boys who have joined the colors, and who must soon leave home and friends and go to a foreign land to live in the trenches or the dugouts, imperiling their health and their lives in defense of their country?" Have they said that they were unwilling to contribute anything to care for these men when sick or wounded, or to pay the expense of bringing their mortal remains back to their native land if they shall die from exposure, disease, or wounds, or if they are killed upon the field of battle?

Mr. President, no such protests have come to me, and I do not expect any such protests to come.

One personal reference and I am through. I have been told that the war-profits tax the Senate amendments impose is heavy, and that my part in imposing this tax will count against my political future. I have been told that certain industries or the representatives of certain industries in my State object to these higher rates imposed in the bill of the committee of which I am chairman, and I have been advised to beware. I have been told that the farmers of my State will resent their inclusion by the Senate committee in the war taxes and will hold me, as chairman of that committee, responsible to them.

Mr. President, I do not believe a word of that. I do not believe that the people of my State or of this country are made of any such stuff. Their past history shows nothing of this kind. On the contrary, the records show that they are brave, and just, and patriotic. They may be temporarily misled and they may misunderstand, but they will be eventually undeceived, and understanding will approve. I have no misgiving and no fear.

But however that may be, the confidence reposed in me by my constituents in my election to this body on three different occasions, as well as the compliment paid me by my colleagues of this body in making me chairman of this great committee, has devolved upon me a responsibility to my country which I dare not shirk nor attempt to evade. As chairman of this great committee which has brought in this bill—the greatest of all budgets—my duty is to the whole country and to all the people. I dare not subordinate that duty to local, sectional, or party interests or considerations. I dare not subordinate that duty to any other consideration than that of obligation to my country in the high and responsible position to which my countrymen have elevated me in connection with the great undertaking in which we are now engaged. I believe that what has been done has been done in response to the urgent needs of the Government to win this war, upon the successful prosecution of which depends the future weal or woe, yea, the very liberties, Mr. President, and independence of a hundred million people. Upon the successful prosecution of this war depend not only the fortunes of those who live here in this day and generation, but the fortunes and the future of those who shall come after us; for I believe from the bottom of my heart—as I believe in my God—that if this war shall be lost by us and our allies, the time will speedily come when, singlehanded, we shall have to meet the greatest military power and military machine in all the tides of time, backed by 10,000,000 soldiers in arms, flushed with victory, with their adequate and efficient navy supplemented by the navies of their vanquished foes, and that we shall either have to submit and pay possibly an indemnity equal to all the expense that our enemy may be forced to incur or else take our chances in a doubtful struggle.

Mr. President, the boys who have gone to the front, the 2,000,000 that we are now calling to the colors, who possibly soon will have to go across the waters to live in the trenches and to imperil their lives in defense of the country—these brave boys are risking their lives for their country. Why, then, should you or I hesitate in this crisis to discharge our duty to our country as we see it, to discharge the duty of this hour and of this high forum, because, forsooth, it may imperil our political fortunes? Are the political lives of members of the Senate and of the other House, charged with this great and sacred duty to their country, of more consequence to them than are the physical lives of the 2,000,000 boys whom we have by legislation called into the service of our country?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I desire to speak for only a moment. I deem it very important that no misinformation shall go out to the country this afternoon with reference to the minimum guaranty on the price of wheat. When the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] remarked that there was no absolute guaranty of that price, I confess that I was shocked, for I thought I fully understood the bill relative to that matter, and I was certain that there was such a provision; but I took up the bill and turned to section 14, and I there found this language:

SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit.

I confess I could hardly understand how this provision could have been incorporated in the bill without having impressed itself upon my mind. I felt so certain that we had provided an absolute guaranty of $2 per bushel for wheat that I could hardly believe my eyes on reading this language; but in turning forward to about the middle of the section, I find that the original provision in the beginning of the section was modified so that my first understanding of the bill was fully substantiated. That part of the section reads:

The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets.

Now here is the essence of the whole section:

This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919.

So really it is unquestionably true that there is an absolute guaranty to the farmer of $2 a bushel on wheat; and, as I remarked in the opening, I do not want any misinformation to go out in regard to this matter, because it might cause a good deal of trouble throughout the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a short time ago in this discussion, and not having a copy of the food-control bill before me, I gave it as my opinion that under the provisions of the bill the guaranty was still dependent upon the President first finding that an emergency existed requiring the stimulation of food production, and that the guaranty of $2 per bushel contained in the middle of the section and the guaranty following related more to the value and not to the fact of there being a guaranty. However, a second more careful reading of the bill convinced me that I was in error and that the guaranty which reads, "This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919," does assure the guaranty to cover the 1918 crop and all that shall be marketed prior to the 1st day of May, 1919.

I am pleased to state upon the RECORD that my first conclusion was erroneous and that every farmer in this country may depend, no matter whether or not the President first finds that an emergency exists, on receiving for his wheat the equivalent of $2 at the principal interior markets for the crop of 1918, but not longer than that under the guaranty.

Mr. BRADY obtained the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to ask my colleague a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask my colleague if he understands that the guaranty which he has read applies to the crop of 1917?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; I do not think it does. It applies only to a crop that is to be raised in the future.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not apply to the crop of 1917, as I understand it, but it applies only to the crop of 1918.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, there is no guaranty of price for the crop which will be raised in 1917, but there is a positive guaranty of $2 per bushel for the crop that will be harvested in 1918.

Mr. President, in these strenuous times it is impossible for any Senator to keep in touch with the details of each and every bill, and when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] made the statement that he was of the opinion that the price of $2 per bushel for wheat was not completely guaranteed for any year, I felt satisfied that by calling his attention to the matter he would correct his statement, for he has at all times and on all occasions been interested in and worked for the benefit of the farmer and the producing classes of this country. I hope the Senator will understand that it was only for that reason that I called his attention to the fact that we have a positive guaranty as to the price of wheat for 1918; and I am very glad to have the RECORD properly corrected, so that a wrong impression relative to that matter will not go out to the country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have learned for the first time that this is a positive guaranty of the price of wheat for the year 1918. I will ask the Senator from Idaho if we have provided a guaranty that the farmer shall have double the normal price for his product, how we can expect to oppose a doubling of the price of everything else in the near future, including iron, steel, aluminum, copper, and coal; and how we can expect to resist an increase in wages amounting to double the present wage? If that guaranty has been made—and I presume from the debate it has been made—my attention has been called to it for the first time; and it seems to me the most unwise action that could have been devised and that we shall have a reckoning regarding it with all vocations and industries.

I desire to add further that if we are going to raise the price level of everything we will find that the wage level will also be raised; that the wage earners will look at the price level always in order to ascertain what their daily wage will buy, and they will maintain the purchasing power of that wage level.

Mr. BRADY obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me to suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that wheat at $2 per bushel does not measure up with the wage standard of to-day throughout the United States.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I, of course, will not attempt to go at any length into the discussion of a bill which has already been enacted into law, but I can not at all agree with the position taken by the Senator from Nevada relative to the guaranty of $2 a bushel for the wheat crop of 1918.

The reason for guaranteeing $2 a bushel for the wheat crop to be harvested and sold in 1918 was in order to increase the production of wheat. In the absence of such a guaranty, there would probably be a greater shortage in the wheat crop of that year, the very year when we will need the supply most, than we have had for many years.

I happen to be engaged in the farming business at the present time. For the same labor that before war was declared could be secured for $2 a day, I am to-day paying in some instances $4 a day and to quite a large number of men working on the farm $3 a day and board. I am paying to men employed in connection with irrigating my land $110 a month and board, to whom I used to pay not to exceed two-thirds that amount. Two dollars a bushel according to the price that the farmer has to pay to-day for labor and for the supplies that he must necessarily use is no greater price than one-half that price before war was declared.

It seems to me that it is useless for us to discuss the question of the doubling of prices generally. Referring to steel, before the war the price of steel was from $20 to $28 a ton, while to-day it is from $85 to $120 and $160 a ton. Similar increases have been brought about in almost every other industry. There is not a single article the farmer has to buy for which he does not have to pay from 50 per cent to 150 per cent more than he did in normal times.

For that reason I think that it is very evident that this guaranty is justified, and that it is a just and equitable provision of law. More than that, it does not necessarily mean that the price of flour will be doubled. We paid recently $15 a barrel for flour. With $2 wheat flour can be produced and manufactured for less than $9 a barrel. Therefore we not only protect the farmer by giving him a guaranteed price but we protect the consumer by giving him a food-control bill that will prevent the speculator from doubling the price, and at the same time we are allowing the farmer a reasonable profit for the work which he performs.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have to say with reference to the statement of the Senator from Idaho that, while it is true that skyrocket prices have been prevailing for some time with reference to all commodities, an effort has been made and is being made to prevent and to limit skyrocket prices. We know that is being done with reference to iron and steel and coal, and I presume the efforts will be continued in that direction.

All that I wish to call attention to is this, that just to the extent that we sanction a doubling of the price of any one commodity we must yield to the reasoning that will demand a doubling of the price of other commodities, for they all have a certain relationship to each other; and that, if we double the price of commodities, we necessarily open up an era in which there will be a doubling in the price of labor, because every wage-earner will endeavor to maintain the purchasing power of his daily wage; and if he finds that that daily wage will only buy one-half the flour and one-half the amount of other commodities that it would a year ago, he will insist upon doubling his wage. The result will be that as the price level rises, we will have the wage level constantly rising in order to maintain a proper relation between the two. What will be the result at the end of the war? The result will be that the prices of commodities will be lifted to an abnormal level; that the cost of wages will be lifted to an abnormal level; that the price of commodities will probably tumble when the world commences production again under normal conditions; and that the wage-earners will endeavor to maintain their wage level; for, whilst it is difficult to raise the wage level, it is much more difficult to lower the wage level than it is the price level. So at the end of this war we will have a most serious condition, involving strikes and disorder, with a view to preventing any reduction in the wage level.

It is with reference to this view that I deplore that we have guaranteed an abnormal price for anything. If we guarantee an abnormal price for wheat, $2 a bushel, when it has been $1, why can not the claim be made that we should guarantee abnormal prices for steel, doubling the price of a year ago, or for copper or for other commodities? So we will be moving in a vicious circle, both the wage level and the price level constantly rising, with no advantage to anybody. I do not know what solution there is for this problem, but I regret exceedingly that we have taken upon ourselves the fixing of an abnormal price for anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, unless some Senator desires now to speak on the pending bill, I will ask that it be laid temporarily aside in order that I may move to take up another bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like, Mr. President, to say that the Senate took an adjournment at the time this bill was the unfinished business and a roll call had been had on the question of its passage, the roll call disclosing the absence of a quorum. The bill has been displaced as the unfinished business, and comes up as a new matter on a motion for consideration. If it were the unfinished business and the Senate had taken a recess, of course the calling of the roll would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have to hold that the bill has only lost its position as the unfinished business. When the bill was last under consideration, the question being on its passage, the roll was called but developed the lack of a quorum, whereupon the Senate adjourned. The Chair rules that the question is the calling of the roll on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say a few words in regard to that matter. If that is true, it certainly is contrary to what has been universally held, as I understand. The Senate having taken an adjournment and the measure having been displaced as the unfinished business, when it comes up again it comes up as new matter. I think the rule has been that where a measure has been displaced as the unfinished business and an adjournment takes place, when it comes up again it comes up as new matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair will hold that it comes before the Senate with the yeas and nays ordered on the question of its passage, and that the roll must be called.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. SWANSON. If that is true, I withdraw the request, because we probably have not a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Virginia for the consideration of the bill is withdrawn.

ALLEN M. SUMNER.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2117) to appoint Allen M. Sumner captain on the active list of the United States Marine Corps. This bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is designed to reinstate on the active list of the Marine Corps a former officer who had an excellent record in the service. I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2117) to appoint Allen M. Sumner a captain on the active list of the United States Marine Corps, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the word "kind," to insert:

Provided further, That the said Allen M. Sumner shall be carried as an additional number in the grade to which he may be appointed under the provisions of this act, and in any higher grade to which he may hereafter be promoted: And provided further, That the said Allen M. Sumner be credited with his service as an officer in the Marine Corps Reserve from April 7, 1917, the date of his assignment to active service upon mobilization.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Allen M. Sumner a captain on the active list of the United States Marine Corps in the place on the list of captains to which he would be entitled by reason of the length of his previous commissioned service in the Marine Corps in comparison with the prior commissioned service of the captains on the active list of the Marine Corps at the date of approval of this act: Provided, That the said Allen M. Sumner shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness for such appointment: Provided further, That the said Allen M. Sumner shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to back pay or emoluments of any kind: Provided further, That the said Allen M. Sumner shall be carried as an additional number in the grade to which he may be appointed under the provisions of this act, and in any higher grade to which he may hereafter be promoted: And provided further, That the said Allen M. Sumner be credited with his service as an officer in the Marine Corps Reserve from April 7, 1917, the date of his assignment, to active service upon mobilization.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 13, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pilot Point, of the Woman's Methodist Missionary Society of Mount Vernon, of the Woman's Missionary Society of Wharton, of the Woman's Missionary Society of Irene, of the Woman's Missionary Society of Hale Center, of the Woman's Missionary Society of Paris, of the Missionary Society of Pittsburgh, and of the Woman's Missionary Society of Stephenville, all in the State of Texas, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to permit an exchange of censored mails between the United States and Hungary, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a telegram from the West Coast Lumbermen's Association in reference to the industrial condition there. I will not take the time of the Senate to have it read, but I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., August 12, 1917.

Hon. WESLEY JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please say to Congress that the lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest is not opposed to a national eight-hour day within the lumber industry, but can not grant a regional eight-hour day, as urged by the Secretary of War in telegrams of August 10, without wrecking the industry, which employs 60 per cent of all wage earners in this State, and upon which practically all other business and industry here is largely dependent. This convulsion of the lumber industry, if forced to grant a regional 8-hour day on 10 hours' pay, would come through an immediate increase of 25 per cent in the cost of manufacturing Pacific Northwest lumber, which now is unable to successfully compete east of the Mississippi River with lumber from the Lake States and the South, which lumber reaches the principal consuming markets of the country on shorter freight hauls and lower freight rates. The Pacific Northwest lumber industry is now paying common labor the highest wages paid in the lumber industry of this or any other country. Common labor in Washington and Oregon is receiving from $3 to $3.50 a day as compared with from $1.75 to $2 for similar labor at mills of the South, at which mills the Government is not now seeking to enforce an eight-hour day. Please make it plain also that our industry is not delaying the Nation's great war aircraft program. It has not yet received an order for a stick of lumber for that purpose. The industry has pledged the Secretary of War that when orders and specifications do come it will furnish material as fast as required. In the meantime the season for most efficiently getting out this material is fast slipping away and our mills are refusing commercial contracts in order that every available resource and manufacturing capacity may be available for Government requirements. In this war there is just as much patriotism in industry as there is in individuals, and there is just as much patriotism in the State of Washington, outside the striking Industrial Workers of the World, as there is in the city of Washington. Lumber prices from the Pacific Northwest for cantonments and ships are lower than from any other region and the service has been such that the men at the front will not have to pay the price of delays, so far as this industry is concerned. Consult Forest Service Report No. 114 and Federal Trade Commission in substantiation of statement that we on an 8-hour day at 10-hour pay can not compete with other producing regions unless 8-hour day is made national within the industry. The strike here is primarily Industrial Workers of the World, who announce that when eight-hour day is won they will proceed to shorten the working day in this industry to six hours. Concerning our industrial conditions and already restricted markets, please consult Dr. Wilson Compton, who recently investigated this industry for the Federal Trade Commission.

WEST COAST LUMBERMEN'S ASSOCIATION,
ROBERT B. ALLEN, Secretary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of Oktibbeha County, Miss., respectfully urging upon Congress the immediate passage of the bill H. R. 5181, the purpose of which is to prohibit the sending of conscripted or drafted men outside of the territorial limits without their consent. The petition consists of only about four lines, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of Oktibbeha County, Miss., respectfully urge upon Congress the immediate passage of H. R. 5181, introduced June 25, 1917, by Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON, of Illinois.

P. W. FULGHAM
(And 62 others).

Mr. ASHURST. I present resolutions adopted at the annual meeting of the Coconino Cattle Growers' Association, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLAGSTAFF, ARIZ., August 8, 1917.

Hon. HENRY ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the regular annual meeting of our association on August 1 the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas a bill has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by Senator GORE prohibiting the interstate transportation of cows and calves for slaughter; and

"Whereas in the judgment of the Coconino Cattle Growers' Association it will not serve the purpose of increasing the production of meat-food animals, because the grasses on our ranges are limited and we can better subserve the purpose of fattening and slaughtering the old cows and retaining the young stock upon the ranges; and

"Whereas it is the experience of the stockmen that old cows left on the range will perish during the winters, after eating a lot of grass, causing the younger cattle to suffer loss of flesh, if not death; and

"Whereas the most economic use of old cows and their calves can be put to is by fattening and slaughter: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Coconino Cattle Growers' Association in annual meeting assembled this 1st day of August, 1917, That you be requested to do all in your power to see that said bill does not pass."

And the secretary instructed to present this matter to you.

Since this matter is of vital importance to the stock-raising industry of our State, we most earnestly request your assistance against this bill.

Very truly, yours,

THE COCONINO CATTLE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
By T. E. MCCULLOUGH, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Phoenix, Ariz., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the United States is now at war; and

Whereas to successfully prosecute the war and afford the best protection for the lives of those who will carry the arms of the country to the front, the utmost diligence must be exercised in all industries, and every citizen must do the work for which he is especially fitted; and

Whereas large numbers of people are reported to be in idleness, while at the same time certain industries suffer for lack of help: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Phoenix, Ariz., urge upon the Arizona delegation in Congress the need of a census of labor, and recommend that an industrial drafting service be devised to be in operation during the war; and be it further

Resolved, That we recommend legislation be enacted which will prohibit in every form advocation of crime, sabotage, violence, and any unlawful methods of securing industrial or political reforms.

Dated at Phoenix, Ariz., this 3d day of August, 1917.

H. J. MCCLUNG, President.
HARRY WELCH, Secretary.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD this condensed statement from the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, entitled "Why not tell the truth about the river and harbor bill?"

I may add to that statement the further fact that of the sum which will be required to complete the projects adopted in this bill nearly one-half will go to the harbors of New York. I ask that the statement may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY NOT TELL THE TRUTH ABOUT THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL?

[A statement from the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association.]

"That the river and harbor bill of 1917, drawn in accordance with the estimates of the Chief of Engineers and approved in advance by the Secretary of War and the President, is a wise and practical measure is evident upon a study of its schedules.

"The criticisms of the bill that have been going the rounds of the press have been due mainly, in our judgment, to the fact that representatives of the press have not analyzed the text of the bill nor considered the reasons for the various items so abundantly stated in the committee report. They have found it more convenient, under pressure of other work, to use ready-made statements emanating from a small, self-righteous, and peculiarly reckless minority. 'Waste and extravagance' is the catchword; 'no practical need for the work, millions going into little creeks, rivers that ought to be paved, streams that should be stood up on edge.' And where sectionalism still appeals, 'the most is intended for distribution in the South.'

"We deny all these statements and challenge Members of Congress and representatives of the press to cite facts in support of them. They are not true.

"The river and harbor bill as it finally passed Congress carried a total of $27,826,150. Of this, 51.5 per cent, or $14,344,250, is for maintenance and improvement of ocean harbors on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico; 8.1 per cent., or $2,261,100, is for maintenance and improvement of inland lake harbors and channels; 31.3 per cent, or $8,725,000, is for maintenance and improvement of five leading inland rivers, under projects previously adopted by Congress; 1.2 per cent, or $325,000, is for examinations, surveys, and a commission; and there remains only 7.9 per cent, or $2,170,800, to cover all other projects in all parts of the country; maintenance and improvements of river, harbors, canals, waterways, and removal of obstructions. Where are the 'millions for creeks' and the 'chunks of pork' for favored sections? Where are the 'items tacked on by individual Members'? Every item refers to a War Department report and estimate, and the total allowed by Congress is less than the War Department requests.

"That is the truth about the river and harbor bill of 1917. The rest is ignorance, prejudice, and misinformation.

"In support whereof a classified summary compiled from the official bill is subjoined. Let the pork hunters point out the pork!

TREATY OF THE HOLY ALLIANCE.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the treaty of the holy alliance with the amendment of 1822, known as the secret treaty of Verona, with a memorandum in relation thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not hear what the request was.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the treaty of the holy alliance, of about four or five clauses, and the treaty of Verona, attached as an amendment to it, declaring a world war on democracy by the organized sovereignties of Europe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREATY BETWEEN AUSTRIA, PRUSSIA, AND RUSSIA, SIGNED AT PARIS SEPTEMBER 18–26, 1815.

[Translation.]

"In the name of the most holy and indivisible Trinity.

"Holy alliance of sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia.

"Their Majesties the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Russia, having, in consequence of the great events which have marked the course of the three last years in Europe, and especially of the blessings which it has pleased Divine Providence to shower down upon those States which place their confidence and their hope on it alone, acquired the intimate conviction of the necessity of settling the steps to be observed by the powers, in the reciprocal relations, upon the sublime truths which the holy religion of our Savior teaches.

"GOVERNMENT AND POLITICAL RELATIONS.

"They solemnly declare that the present act has no other object than to publish, in the face of the whole world, their fixed resolution, both in the administration of their respective States and in their political relations with every other Government, to take for their sole guide the precepts of that holy religion, namely, the precepts of justice, Christian charity, and peace, which, far from being applicable only to private concerns, must have an immediate influence on the councils of princes and guide all their steps as being the only means of consolidating human institutions and remedying their imperfections. In consequence, their majesties have agreed on the following articles:

"PRINCIPLES OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

"ARTICLE I. Conformably to the words of the Holy Scriptures, which command all men to consider each other as brethren, the three contracting monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity, and, considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will on all occasions and in all places lend each other aid and assistance; and regarding themselves toward their subjects and armies as fathers of families, they will lead them, in the same spirit of fraternity with which they are animated, to protect religion, peace, and justice.

"FRATERNITY AND AFFECTION.

"ART. II. In consequence, the sole principle of force, whether between the said governments or between their subjects, shall be that of doing each other reciprocal service and of testifying by unalterable good will the mutual affection with which they ought to be animated, to consider themselves all as members of one and the same Christian nation, the three allied princes looking on themselves as merely delegated by Providence to govern three branches of the one family, namely, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, thus confessing that the Christian world, of which they and their people form a part, has in reality no other sovereign than Him to whom alone power really belongs, because in Him alone are found all the treasures of love, science, and infinite wisdom; that is to say, God, our Divine Savior, the Word of the Most High, the Word of Life. Their majesties consequently recommend to their people, with the most tender solicitude, as the sole means of enjoying that peace which arises from a good conscience and which alone is durable, to strengthen themselves every day more and more in the principles and exercise of the duties which the Divine Savior has taught to mankind.

"ACCESSION OF FOREIGN POWERS.

"ART. III. All the powers who shall choose solemnly to avow the sacred principles which have dictated the present act and shall acknowledge how important it is for the happiness of nations, too long agitated, that these truths should henceforth exercise over the destinies of mankind all the influence which belongs to them, will be received with equal ardor and affection in this 'holy alliance.'

"Done in triplicate and signed at Paris, the year of grace 1815, 14/26 September.

"FRANCIS. [L. S.]
"FREDERICK WILLIAM. [L. S.]
"ALEXANDER. [L. S.]"

"On the 26th of September, 1815, Francis, Frederick William, and Alexander addressed the following letter to the prince regent of Great Britain to accede to the treaty of the holy alliance, as follows:

"'The sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia to the prince regent of Great Britain.

"'PARIS, September 26, 1815.

"'SIR OUR BROTHER AND COUSIN: The events which have afflicted the world for more than 20 years have convinced us that the only means of putting an end to them is to be found in the most free and most intimate union between the sovereigns whom divine providence has placed over the heads of the peoples of Europe.

"'The history of the three memorable years which are about to pass away bear witness to the beneficial effects of which this union has been for the good of mankind; but in order to assure to this bond the solidity which the grandeur and the purity of the aim to which it tends imperiously demands we have thought it should be founded on the sacred principles of the Christian religion.

"'Deeply convinced of this important truth, we have concluded and signed the act which we now submit to the consideration of your royal highness. Your royal highness may be assured that its object is to strengthen the relations which unite us, in forming of all the nations of Christendom in one single family and assuring them by this, under the protection of the Almighty, happiness, security, the benefits of peace, and the bonds of fraternity forever indissoluble. We deeply regretted that your royal highness was not united with us at the important moment when we concluded this transaction. We invite you, as our first and most intimate ally, to agree with it and to complete a work singularly consecrated to the good of mankind and which we ought to consider the best reward for our efforts.

"'FRANCIS.
"'FREDERICK WILLIAM.
"'ALEXANDER.

"'OUR BROTHER AND COUSIN,
"'The Prince Regent of Great Britain.'

"To which the prince regent replied as follows:

"'2. The prince regent of Great Britain to the sovereigns of Austria, Prussia, and Russia, respectively.

"'CARLTON HOUSE, October 6, 1815.

"'SIR MY BROTHER AND COUSIN: I have had the honor of receiving your imperial majesty's letter, together with the copy of the treaty signed by your majesty and your august allies at Paris on the 26th of September.

"'As the forms of the British Constitution, which I am called upon to administer in the name and on behalf of the King, my father, preclude me from acceding formally to this treaty in the shape in which it has been presented to me, I adopt this course of conveying to the august sovereigns who have signed it my entire concurrence in the principles they have laid down and in the declaration which they have set forth of making the divine precepts of the Christian religion the invariable rule of their conduct in all their relations, social and political, and of cementing the union which ought ever to subsist between all Christian nations; and it will be always my earnest endeavor to regulate my conduct in the station in which Divine Providence has vouchsafed to place me by these sacred maxims and to cooperate with my august allies in all measures which may be likely to contribute to the peace and happiness of mankind.

"'With the most invariable sentiments of friendship and affection, I am,

"'Sir, my brother and cousin,

"'Your imperial majesty's good brother and cousin,

"'GEORGE, P. R.

"'HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.
"'(Prussia and Russia, respectively.)'"

MEMO.

"It will be observed that this treaty of the holy alliance was signed by the sovereigns themselves, and not through their representatives.

"This treaty was drawn at the instance of Alexander I. The King of Prussia signed the paper from motives of friendship for the Czar.

"Metternich, the prime minister of Austria, observed with regard to this treaty:

"'C'est du verbiage'—that is, 'merely a matter of words.'

"Its only significance was an appeal to the religious sentiment of the people of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, and never exercised the slightest restraint upon their rulers. The holy alliance made Christianity the cloak under which the kings of Europe tried to perpetuate the helotage of their subjects. Metternich was the ablest, the most skillful spider in all the chancelleries of Europe, working for autocracy.

"Alexander I had really humane impulses and a democratic spirit, but Metternich surrounded him with spies, who constantly whispered to Alexander suspicions of the people, making Alexander believe that he was in deadly danger of assassination from the people, until he was persuaded that only the iron hand of absolute monarchy could safeguard his throne and his own life.

"Metternich observed the tendency of the people of Europe toward democracy and laid the plans for its complete destruction and overthrow. The cruelty and corruption of the Bourbons had led to the French Revolution and the establishment of the French Republic. The people of France, unlearned in self-government, advocating the doctrines of liberty, equity, and fraternity. They had no experience in organized democracies, and Napoleon used their inexperience to make himself Emperor and to overrun Europe, resulting in the overthrow of Napoleon and placing Louis XVIII, the Bourbon prince, on the throne of France as an absolute monarch.

"Under Metternich's crafty intrigue, the secret treaty of Verona was drawn up by the representatives of Francis of Austria, in the person of Metternich; the representative of Louis XVIII, in the person of Chateaubriand; the representative of Frederick William of Prussia, Bernstet, and by the representative of Alexander I of Russia, Nesselrode, November 22, 1822, as follows:

"[American Diplomatic Code, 1778–1884, vol. 2; Elliott, p. 179.]

SECRET TREATY OF VERONA.

"The undersigned, specially authorized to make some additions to the treaty of the Holy Alliance, after having exchanged their respective credentials, have agreed as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. The high contracting powers being convinced that the system of representative government is equally as incompatible with the monarchial principles as the maximum of the sovereignty of the people with the divine right, engage mutually, in the most solemn manner, to use all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative governments, in whatever country it may exist in Europe, and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known.

"ART. 2. As it can not be doubted that the liberty of the press is the most powerful means used by the pretended supporters of the rights of nations to the detriment of those of princes, the high contracting parties promise reciprocally to adopt all proper measures to suppress it, not only in their own States but also in the rest of Europe.

"ART. 3. Convinced that the principles of religion contribute most powerfully to keep nations in the state of passive obedience which they owe to their princes, the high contracting parties declare it to be their intention to sustain in their respective States those measures which the clergy may adopt with the aim of ameliorating their own interests, so intimately connected with the preservation of the authority of the princes; and the contracting powers join in offering their thanks to the Pope for what he has already done for them, and solicit his constant cooperation in their views of submitting the nations.

"ART. 4. The situation of Spain and Portugal unite uphappily all the circumstances to which this treaty has particular reference. The high contracting parties, in confiding to France the care of putting an end to them, engaged to assist her in the manner which may the least compromit them with their own people and the people of France by means of a subsidy on the part of the two empires of 20,000,000 of francs every year from the date of the signature of this treaty to the end of the war.

"ART. 5. In order to establish in the Peninsula the order of things which existed before the revolution of Cadiz, and to insure the entire execution of the articles of the present treaty, the high contracting parties give to each other the reciprocal assurance that as long as their views are not fulfilled, rejecting all other ideas of utility or other measure to be taken, they will address themselves with the shortest possible delay to all the authorities existing in their States and to all their agents in foreign countries, with the view to establish connections tending toward the accomplishment of the objects proposed by this treaty.

"ART. 6. This treaty shall be renewed with such changes as new circumstances may give occasion for, either at a new congress or at the court of one of the contracting parties, as soon as the war with Spain shall be terminated.

"ART. 7. The present treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications exchanged at Paris within the space of six months.

"Made at Verona the 22d November, 1822.

MEMO.

"[It is here observed that the representatives of four military autocracies solemnly engaged to put an end to representative government in Europe, as well as 'in those countries where it is not yet known.'

"That they solemnly engaged to suppress the liberty of the press as a means of suppressing representative government of the people throughout Europe by suppressing knowledge and reason and understanding.

"That they intended to use the principles of religion as a means of keeping the people 'in the state of passive obedience which they owe to their princes.'

"That they definitely arranged with Louis XVIII, the autocratic Bourbon King of France, to put an end to the constitutional government in Spain and Portugal, and to do this secretly 'in the manner which may the least compromise them with their own people,' by a subsidy of 20,000,000 francs per annum until the limited monarchy of Spain and Portugal were converted into absolute monarchies.

"It was further provided by this infamous conspiracy of the 'holy alliance' against the right of the people to govern themselves 'that the high contracting parties give to each other the reciprocal assurance that as long as their views are not fulfilled, rejecting all other ideas of utility or other measure to be taken, they will address themselves, with the shortest possible delay, to all the authorities existing in their States and to all other agents in foreign countries, with the view to establish connections tending toward the accomplishment of the objects proposed by this treaty.'

"That is, the accomplishment of the absolute overthrow of representative government anywhere on earth—the destruction of all democracies.]"

MEMO.

"[When the secret treaty of Verona was signed in 1822 the autocracies of Prussia and Austria, France and Russia proposed to send their armies and navies to reduce the revolting colonies of Spain and Portugal on the Western Hemisphere—that is, to destroy every democracy on the Western Hemisphere except the United States.

"Prime Minister Canning, of Great Britain, immediately entered a vigorous protest and advised the holy alliance that Great Britain would not approve such action.

"Thereupon President Monroe, under this organized threat against the democracies of the New World, notified the holy alliance in his famous message of December, 1823, that the United States would regard it as an unfriendly act for the powers of Europe to attempt to establish their system of government on the Western Hemisphere.]"

ARTICLE BY CHARLES W. ELIOT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article entitled "Democracy's big strides forward during the war," written by Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, and which appeared in the New York Times of August 5. It is an article so replete in wisdom that I desire that every Senator and Member of the House and the people at large may have an opportunity to read it. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, Aug. 5, 1917.]

DEMOCRACY'S BIG STRIDES FORWARD DURING THE WAR—PRESIDENT EMERITUS OF HARVARD REVIEWS THE SITUATION IN THE WARRING NATIONS AND POINTS OUT THE PRINCIPAL LESSONS WHICH THE CONFLICT HAS TAUGHT MANKIND.

In a few weeks or months the American people will begin to sacrifice their sons by the thousand in the most savage and cruel war that has ever been waged. They have already begun to expend the savings of generations on preparations for fighting and destruction, and they have stopped innumerable forms of expenditure which contributed to their welfare and that of their descendants. Under these circumstances it is fitting that the voters and their political leaders review the war situation as it stands to-day and take account of the gains for human liberty and the democratic form of government which have already been secured.

The principal features of the war situation are as follows:

(1) The two principal contestants—the central monarchies and the entente allies—have demonstrated that each can hold the other in trench warfare; so that no considerable, well-defended areas can be conquered by either party. In open country where the means of communication are scanty or difficult each can successfully come back against the other after defeat or withdrawal, and neither side when ocupying new territory has thus far been able to disarm or extinguish the opposing army. The Belgian, Serbian, and Roumanian armies are still on foot in large numbers, and no considerable body of German or Austro-Hungarian troops has thus far been forced to surrender. In three years neither side has won a military victory in the old sense. There has been no Austerlitz or Waterloo or Sedan or Yorktown, and there is not likely to be. In this sense President Wilson was right when he used the ambiguous phrase "peace without victory." It has been a war without victory on land and without any victory on sea of the Nelson sort.

(2) Industrial and financial strength having been proved necessary to the acquisition and maintenance of great military power, it appears that the manufacturing nations are the only ones that can endure long wars; because they alone can create and maintain inexhaustible supplies of munitions and of the modern means of rapid transportation on land and water for both men and supplies. An agricultural or pastoral people engaged in serious war will require the aid of a manufacturing people. Hence, ultimate success in war will go to the side which has been made wealthiest and strongest by successful commerce, agriculture, mining, and manufacturing; provided that this wealth and these industrial achievements have not impaired the public morality and energy.

(3) The success of Great Britain and France in developing under the most trying circumstances a greater efficiency than that of Germany in the manufactures indispensable to modern war has settled the question whether despotically ruled peoples have an advantage over free peoples in warfare in which every resource of modern science is utilized, and settled it in favor of the freer.

(4) The war has also proved already that violations of treaties on the ground of military necessity and oppressive exactions on the population remaining in conquered territory do not profit the conqueror in the present state of the civilized world, except as he appropriates for immediate use machinery, fuel, foods, and raw material, but on the contrary are disastrous to him and his cause. In other words, the war has proved that the moral and physical forces which can be rallied to the side of international justice are sufficient to make acts of international injustice inexpedient and unprofitable.

(5) It clearly appears that all the nations of Europe now recognized as such can command the services in proper proportion to their population of soldiers who are robust, brave, and patriotic, and that there is no nation in Europe so degenerate morally or physically that a strong and healthy nation may rightfully seize it and govern it for its own good. Both sides exhibit full capacity for acquiring the skill needed to use artillery, airplanes, telephones, photographs, and motor trucks; and all are capable of hand-to-hand fighting with bayonets, swords, knives, and hand grenades. The primitive savage with all his hunting and fighting instincts reappears to-day in civilized white men as well as in Turks, Turcos, and Gurkhas.

(6) As the war has gone on the conviction has gradually penetrated all the Governments and peoples concerned that the redressing of three great international wrongdoings must be included in any terms of settlement which are to have a fair chance of leading to durable peace. These wrongs are the partition of Poland (1772), the wresting of Alsace-Lorraine from France by Germany (1871), accompanied by an attempt to "bleed France white," and the Treaty of Berlin (1878), which outraged Russia and planted seeds of fierce discord among the Balkan peoples. All thinking people have come to understand that no permanent peace for Europe or any relief from competitive armaments can be obtained without disinfecting these festering sores. And yet this disinfection can not but prove a very difficult task.

(7) The war has greatly strengthened the conviction, held by most publicists who have had occasion to consider the causes of grave international disputes, that the peace of the world would be much more secure if nations which possess few ports or none could obtain, under firm international conventions, free access to the seas and oceans through the territories and ports of other nations. An interior country, like Serbia, or a great interior subarctic region like the Russian Empire or Canada needs for its own free life and growth access to the seas and oceans through the ports of other countries, if it has few or none of its own. For the full enjoyment of such rights durable peace is necessary. Remove from the European world, or the whole world, the apprehension of war, and the dread that an insular population or a population confined within an interior area naturally feels lest it be deprived of an adequate supply of foods or raw materials, and a principal cause of war would be removed. The Germans' dream of such compression and such deprivation, coupled with an extraordinary belief in the superiority of German civilization to every other civilization, seems to have been the underlyng cause of the present war.

(8) Although the strength and endurance of the belligerents are by no means exhausted, there is a new disposition to speculate and talk about peace ever since President Wilson requested the central monarchies on the one side and the entente allies on the other to state the terms on which they would consent to make peace. Although the two parties are still wide apart in regard to the preliminary terms or conditions on which negotiations for peace might be opened, and although the present condition of Russia has raised new hopes in the minds of the German oligarchy, the disposition of the several Governments to talk about terms of peace is an important feature of the present situation. It is supported, if not induced, by the state of mind among the soldiers of all the nations at war. It will be a dire calamity for the human race if peace negotiations are opened before the central monarchies publicly repent of the invasion of Serbia, the violation of the neutrality treaties on behalf of Belgium, the sinking of the Lusitania, and the Prussian-Turkish treatment of noncombatants.

Two new implements of warfare have been developed during the war—the airplane and the submarine; but the capacities of neither for destruction have been fully revealed. Both violate in practice—by necessity—most of the rules which international law has tried to establish for the protection of noncombatants and the mitigation of the horrors of war. Those who use them require singular skill, courage, and endurance; but neither mercy nor chivalry can often influence their deeds. Those, too, whose duty is to destroy either airplanes or submarines must do so without the least regard to their human occupants. The submarine forces on everybody, assailant or defendant, the policy of killing at sight. Drown or choke your adversary without giving any chance of escape. Take no prisoners. These policies or methods are not yet publicly and avowedly adopted on land. The airplane involves single combat or combat in small groups under very dangerous conditions for both parties and with little chance to surrender for either side. It is kill or be killed. "Bombing" by airplanes means miscellaneous destruction of life and property without taking good aim. This kind of warfare is peculiarly revolting, in spite of the extraordinary bravery and fortitude of the men who engage in it. The use made of submarines by Germany proves that during war à l'outrance between great powers neutrals have no protection against being sunk while passing between neutral ports. This is a new barbarity in war. All nations with exterior trade are interested in determining now, if possible, the future of the submarine.

Such is the formidable scene in which the American people are about to become one of the principal actors. As they enter on this fearful task they can reasonably draw inspiration and hope from the great gains for liberty and democracy which have been already achieved through the war.

The war has brought about extraordinary progress for democracy in Europe, especially in Great Britain and Russia. In Great Britain the gains of democracy within three years have been much more considerable than in all the hundred years previous. They have taken effect chiefly in the executive branch of the Government, including the army and navy, but also in the legislative; and the gains seem likely to be permanent. Three years ago no one familiar with the conditions of public life in Great Britain would have believed that three men with the antecedents of Kitchener, Bonar Law, and Lloyd George could exercise supreme powers in the civil government during the greatest crisis in British history, or that a democratic, extemporized British Army could succeed to the former aristocratic regular army, and fight better. After 10 days' discussion the House of Commons lately adopted by a vote of 8 to 1 a large measure of suffrage reform under the title of "Representation of the people bill." In Russia, the coup d'état was a sudden act and premature, but long foretold in the growing strength and capacity for local government of the provincial and municipal councils, and in the increasing activity in large business of the cooperative societies. It is as yet impossible to tell whether the inexperienced Russian democracy will or will not prove itself capable of establishing at this first effort a firm and efficient government in a democratic form, but the revolution has already accomplished much preliminary work toward that end, and it is almost impossible to believe that Czardom, or anything like it, can be reproduced in Russia, or that the landed nobility and the permanent official class, both military and civil, can regain the power they have lost.

It is equally difficult to believe that the professional, commercial, and manufacturing classes which have now assumed political leadership with strong support from large portions of the agricultural class will be compelled to resign it to labor agitators, socialistic extremists, or disciples of Tolstoy. The United States, believing that Russia will no more return to a Romanoff Czar than France to a Bourbon King, is cooperating with the provisional government in every possible way—with its money, supplies, and engineering experience, and with its practice in political and religious liberty and its hearty sympathy. Such cooperation between two huge democracies augurs well for the future safety of democracy throughout the world. The unexampled experiment which the mission to Russia from the United States has had in hand is one of extraordinary interest; for it is an effort on the part of a people long accustomed to public liberty to help a multitudinous people with no experience of political freedom and but lately escaped from serfdom to establish in war time a firm and effective republican government.

It is an immense permanent gain for democracy that the democratic Governments of Great Britain and France have proved themselves capable of great efficiency in time of war. Comparative study of democratic and autocratic governments during the last 130 years has revealed the fact that in times of peace democratic governments are not so effective as autocratic governments can sometimes be in promoting the physical welfare of the people governed. Germany had cleaner and better ordered cities, more effective vocational schools, and better sanitary and medical supervision than any democratic government in Europe or America could show; so that many people doubted whether a democratic government could develop as much efficiency in war as an autocratic government. But both Great Britain and France have already exhibited, and the United States is about to exhibit, a greater efficiency in war and in the industries that support war than Germany or any other autocratic government has ever attained.

The war has also proved that free peoples, in which financial and industrial corporate management has been largely developed, and many citizens possess a high degree of personal initiative and energy in their daily work, can outdo in industrial productiveness any peoples that are autocratically governed. The free peoples may start far in the rear when war breaks out, but in a year or two they will catch up with and surpass their autocratically governed opponents. This is a demonstration of high importance to the democracies of the future, as well as of great significance in regard to the outcome of the present war, for these methods of democratic society, which are quite independent of Government processes, are prime sources of democratic efficiency.

It has also been proved that democratic armies fight better than armies aristocratically organized and autocratically governed; or, in other words, that the armies of nations in which the mass of the people determine legislation, elect their public servants, and settle questions of peace and war, fight better than the armies of an autocrat who rules by right of birth and by commission from the Almighty. The obedient, submissive soldier who always acts under orders without personal initiative or intelligent comprehension of his immediate task is outclassed by the independent soldier who possesses personal initiative and is capable of understanding both the ultimate purpose of the fighting and the immediate object of the movement in which he is to take part. The soldier who is to take effective part in trench warfare must be capable of fighting intelligently and persistently without seeing or hearing an officer or even a noncommissioned officer during the actual charge. The great war has developed in the democratic countries a new and more effective kind of private soldier and a new and more effective kind of officer, and in producing these better kinds of soldier and officer a democracy has a great and permanent advantage over an autocracy.

The war and Germany's elaborate preparation for it have proved beyond all doubt that no reliance for the peace of the world can be placed on any of the Utopian schemes which for centuries have been from time to time announced as sure methods of preventing war and leaving mankind free to advance, unafraid and at ease, on peaceful paths of gradual political, industrial, and social development. Discussions of world parliaments, world public opinion, world courts, vast leagues to prevent war, societies of nations, and schemes to reform the world through improved methods of education and improved international law were never so rife as in the 20 years before the present war broke out. No one of these schemes has even approached fulfillment, or, indeed, definite formulation; but the two Hague Conferences, although they were in many respects disappointing, had persuaded some people inclined to political and philanthropic speculation that the time was near when international law and international organization could prevent international war without the use of force.

All these plans and hopes were completely defeated by the outbreak of the present war; and they will remain defeated and powerless so long as a single strong nation in Europe adheres to the principles and practices of autocratic government allied with a large class of professional soldiers. The same may be said of the official religions which prevail among the various belligerents to-day. No one of the national churches or religious institutions concerned—Buddhist, Greek, Roman, Mohammedan, or Protestant—has shown the least capacity to obstruct or condemn the long and elaborate preparation for war by Germany or to oppose the un-Christian philosophy concerning the state which justified that preparation, or to prevent the outbreak of the war, or to mitigate its unexampled ferocity. It is a large gain for humanity to have learned, once for all, that no inchoate international organization and no instituted religion or established church can be depended on to secure to the civilized world of to-day an enduring peace and to all nations a rightful liberty. Peace, liberty, and justice must be secured by practicable measures of obvious immediate serviceableness. The world in agony is in no mood for remote goals or vast and hazy imaginings; it will take the one step which seems feasible and be satisfied with that. It will be a martial step, but its goal will be human brotherhood.

The war has also demonstrated that the progress of mankind in knowledge of nature and its laws and in skill in utilizing those laws and the material resources of the earth to human advantage will not prevent war, and do not necessarily tend to the preservation of peace. The chemical and physical inventions of the last hundred and fifty years have made the present war infinitely more destructive and horrible than any earlier war, and, indeed, seem to be partly accountable for the extreme ferocity with which war has been conducted in Europe and the near East for three years. The world has learned that the same scientific discoveries and industrial inventions which make the average lot of mankind freer and happier in peace times are capable of making that lot supremely wretched in war times because they increase frightfully the destructiveness of war. The nations therefore must not depend on any Utopian theories or any ecclesiastical institutions or any progress in literature, science, and the arts to defend them in the future from catastrophes and miseries such as the civilized world is now enduring. The means of securing peace hereafter will be simple and practicable, because based on experience in the present war, and efficacious, because supported by an overwhelming peace-preserving international force.

The war has brought into high relief the accumulated wealth of Great Britain, and the extraordinary variety and multiplicity of its financial, industrial, and commercial resources. One legitimate inference from this marvelous strength of Great Britain is that free trade, which has been for many years the policy of Great Britain, and of Great Britain alone in all the world, is the policy most likely to make a manufacturing and commercial nation rich and powerful; partly because free trade best develops international commerce and so supports in the best way national banking and manufacturing, but also because free trade stimulates enterprise, invention, and resourcefulness in the individual business man, encourages him to send his sons all over the world in search of trade or a salary, and prevents him from seeking in his own business an enfeebling protection and furtherance from his Government. The war has also demonstrated to both labor and capital in the United States that eager foreign markets are highly desirable in addition to the home market, because they make all business broader, larger, and steadier. It will be a great gain if it teaches all the manufacturing nations of the world not to build about their own people tariff walls, but to trust for success within each nation to its own industrial genius and peculiar resources, and to freedom of trade.

The experience of the British Government during the last two years in increasing the production of many of the national industries, especially of shipbuilding, mining, and the manufacture of munitions and other army and navy supplies, and in applying all possible means of transportation by land and sea and in the air to the uses of war, has taught several important lessons concerning the promotion of national productiveness and general industrial efficiency, which are going to be quite as significant when peace comes as they have been during the active warfare. The best of these lessons are:

1. Adequate production in manufacturing industries can not be brought about or maintained without the abandonment of the doctrine of limited output, a doctrine long carried into practice by some important labor organizations.

2. Production can be greatly increased by using the machinery of industrial plants continuously, with three shifts of workers per day.

3. No considerable or durable enlargement of production can be brought about by lengthening the hours of daily employment for the individual workman beyond the limit of eight or nine hours to which he is habituated.

4. A large increase of production for the same expenditure on labor can be brought about by giving the skilled workmen abundant assistance from semiskilled and unskilled men and women. The war has brought about great changes in this respect in many British industries—widespread changes, grouped under the name of "dilution of labor." The rules of British trade unions which are inconsistent with this dilution of labor have been in the main abandoned for the time being.

5. The fact that large numbers of women have successfully replaced men in numerous British employments since the war began has had an immediate effect in inducing employers, whether governmental or private, to pay more attention than ever before to the conservation of human bodily energy through the avoidance of accidents, fatigue, and sickness; and this greater attention to good conditions of labor has proved to be a measure of sound economy.

These five lessons are of high and enduring value to civilized society. They promise increased productiveness the world over in times of peace, which in turn promises greater freedom and comfort for the human race through larger earning by the lower-paid laborers and steadier work for all, with lower prices for both necessaries and luxuries. These enduring gains for civilization have been achieved under the incitements of a savage war waged on an unprecedented scale.

Again, the cordial and intimate cooperation of Great Britain, France, and the United States which the war has brought about is an immense and permanent gain for civilization. In the war against Germany, Great Britain, France, and the United States have common objects which are fundamental. President Wilson has expressed with utmost clearness one of these common objects: "The world must be made safe for democracy." That safety can be promptly secured in only one way—through the effective action of a league of nations which are accustomed to political liberty, and have become competent through recent experience to act together faithfully and persistently in the use of their combined resources and forces for common objects. As President Wilson has more than once said, the peace of the world must rest on the sure foundations of political liberty, well organized in experienced national governments. Great Britain and the United States are experienced and stable democracies, and France, though comparatively inexperienced in party government, has fairly earned that title through 47 years of orderly control by a National Assembly, the last three years having been years of highly successful, defensive war under the most formidable conditions.

All three of these nations are fighting now in order that the world "under God shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth," and all three peoples accept this definition of righteous government, which Lincoln gave incidentally in the last sentence of his Gettysburg Address. No one of these three nations entertains Utopian schemes of government or social structure, or aims at theoretical perfections. All three know that progress in liberty must be step by step, by discussing and meeting every year, so far as is possible, the community's new needs and desires, by increasing every year public reliance on publicity and free discussion, and always proceeding by the method of compromise and gradual adjustment of old conditions to new aspirations. The war has produced in all three countries some sudden changes in political practices and national industries; but underneath remain as solid foundations the practical experience and the confirmed habits of real democracies. Among these precious habits are submission to the will of the majority, and loyalty to leaders chosen without regard to birth or inherited privilege of any sort, who demonstrate their competency by deeds. In none of these countries has anything resembling a dictatorship appeared. All their constitutional practices persist.

The three nations have been gradually developing a common opinion about the means of enforcing in the world a durable peace, and it is already clear that an effective alliance to enforce peace can be securely founded only on a sound public opinion made effective in and by these three democracies. As President Wilson has admirably expressed it, "A steady concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations."

The American League to Enforce Peace imagined at the start a general cooperation of all the Governments, large or small, democratic or autocratic, to enforce peace, and proposed to do nothing toward the formation of such a league until the close of the present war, and the early opinions which were expressed in England in favor of such a league imagined the inclusion of the central monarchies in the league. The progress of events during the last two years has brought almost all advocates of a league to enforce peace to the conclusion that the autocratic governments should not be admitted to the league, and that the most promising league for the purpose would be the entente allies with the addition of the United States. The real reason for the exclusion of the autocratic governments of Europe from such a league is that they could not be trusted to keep faith. They have repeatedly broken their solemnly plighted word within recent years, and there is no reason to believe that they would be trustworthy in the future. Only nations in which constitutional government is in force could be trusted in such a league. The entente allies and the United States would be its best constituents, because they have had some experience in working together in military and naval operations, and in using military and naval forces effectively under the direction of a central authoritative council. In other words, they are the nations best prepared to enforce peace in the world at large. The assistance of other nations would be acceptable, provided that their government could be properly described as free, and that they could contribute something substantial to the forces of the alliance. Out of such an alliance there might naturally develop a representative international council, an executive commission, and a competent international force.

The great war has developed in Great Britain and France, and will soon be developing in the United States, a new and better kind of soldier—private or officer—than the world has previously seen. The prime requisites in soldiers to-day, in addition to health and strength, are intelligence and personal initiative. In the future, therefore, democracies, if they would possess effective armies, must look after the education of all the children, particularly after their physical training, and must maintain citizens' armies recruited annually by young men who obey readily a law of their country, based on the obligation of all able-bodied men to serve the country in time of war, and therefore to prepare in times of peace for that service. The French Army has always been, since 1789, a democratic army based on universal military service. The English Army to-day is a democratic army, officered chiefly by men who have no idea of making war their profession. The American Army does not as yet conform to this standard, but as soon as the American people realize that every able-bodied young man owes service to his Government as the defender of his own liberties and the world's the American Army will become an unpaid citizens' army, and no other kind of army will be needed by the Republic. One of the best outcomes of the great war will probably be the abandonment by the European democracies of the paid professional military class and the gradual substitution by every other nation of a citizens' army for the present military establishment. So one may hope will disappear, even from the central monarchies, that dangerous class of professional soldiers to which may fairly be ascribed the present woes of Europe. The Swiss military constitution shows the way to this beneficent result.

Great Britain, France, and the United States are at war with Germany and her allies with the same object in view. All three peoples are fighting for what President Wilson has said the American people are fighting for—"For democracy; for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government; for the rights and liberties of small nations; for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free." One can imagine that such a consummation would be worth all the war has cost in the misery of the present generation, in the destruction of property, and the loss of precious lines.

Two other great gains for the world are clearly in prospect—first, the substitution of limited or constitutional monarchies for autocratic monarchies, and, secondly, the abolition of standing or regular armies.

The German Reichstag is already hearing of slight reductions in the autocratic power of the Emperor and a large improvement in the Prussian suffrage; but the changes now proposed will have no influence on the conduct of the war or its duration. Significant political changes in the central monarchies await the future action of the peoples themselves. The governments to be set up for the newly constructed or reconstructed nations—like Poland and Serbia—will undoubtedly be of the constitutional type.

In all countries standing or regular armies have heretofore been officered by men who have no occupation or business except war and preparation for war, and are not engaged in civilian pursuits even during long periods of peace. In the present British Army, far the largest and most effective which Great Britain has ever possessed, there is only a small proportion of officers who have ever been, or mean to be, professional soldiers. In the Swiss Army, of about 500,000 men, there are only two or three thousand permanent officers who are employed the year round as instructors of the successive annual levies, together with a few scientists, all of whose time is devoted to the study of the fresh applications of modern science to war. In the new legislation by the Congress of the United States no permanent army is provided for; and, indeed, when war ceases between the United States and Germany there will remain in the service of the United States only a very small force, hardly sufficient to maintain garrisons in the Panama Zone and the Philippines. The hundreds of thousands of emergency officers and privates will return thankfully to civil life, just as the soldiers of the Civil War did. All enlistments since April 1, 1917, have been for the war only, or for the "emergency." The abolition of paid armies and a professional military class in every nation would be a great safeguard against the recurrence of war and a widespread gain for the arts and industries of peace.

The entente allies will undoubtedly form at the close of the war, or before, an alliance to enforce peace against all comers; but before the United States can enter that alliance a new agreement or understanding will be very desirable, if not indispensable, covering the future policy of the members of the league concerning territorial enlargement or trade development by force of arms. The United States is now fully committed to the policy of no extension of territory by force, and no intervention by force of arms in defense of American citizens who have gone into business in foreign countries of their own accord and for the promotion of their own private interests. Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and Japan are probably not yet committed to that policy of nonintervention; and in times past they, like the United States, have pursued the opposite policy. The policy of nonintervention, if adopted by the entente allies and the American Republics, would put the Monroe doctrine into practice for the whole world—a most desirable consummation in the interest of lasting peace. If such an alliance, including the United States, is to be made, its functions will be more easily exercised if the colonies which Germany has lost during the war are not restored to her. The international navy would have to be potentially present on every sea and ocean, and be provided with coal and oil stations and dockyards all over the world. It would manifestly increase the labors of the international navy if it had to watch a considerable number of stations possessed by Germany, widely distributed and kept well supplied.

This alliance to enforce peace will have the great task of creating the first international legislature, executive, and army and navy. All its work will contribute to the ultimate formation of the comprehensive international parliament and the international court which publicists in many parts of the world have long been urging; but in its early years its membership should be strictly limited, and its functions should be restricted to an effective prevention of war. The formation and maintenance of this alliance will be one of the best results of the war. The sooner this organization is effected the sooner the war will stop and the rehabilitation of the civilized world will begin.

Must, then, gentle and reasonable men and women give over their sons to the National Government to be trained for the devilish work of war? Must civilized society continue to fight war with war? Is not that process a complete failure? Shall we not henceforth contend against evil doing by good doing, against brutality by gentleness, against vice in others solely by virtue in ourselves? There are many sound answers to these insistent queries. One is the policeman, usually a protective and adjusting force, but armed and trained to hurt and kill in defense of society against criminals and lunatics. Another is the mother who blazes into violence, with all her little might, in defense of her child. Even the little birds do that. Another is the instinctive forcible resistance of any natural man to insult or injury committed or threatened against his mother, wife, or daughter. The lions and tigers do as much. A moving answer of a different sort is found in words written by Mme. le Verrier to the parents of Victor Chapman on her return from his funeral in the American Church in Paris:

It * * * has brought home to me the beauty of heroic death and the meaning of life.

The answer from history is that primitive governments were despotic, and in barbarous societies might makes right; but that liberty under law has been wrung from authority and might by strenuous resistance, physical as well as moral, and not by yielding to injustice or practicing nonresistance. The Dutch Republic, the British Commonwealth, the French Republic, the Italian and Scandinavian constitutional monarchies, and the American Republics have all been developed by generations of men ready to fight and fighting. So long as there are wolves sheep can not form a safe community. The precious liberties which a few more fortunate or more vigorous nations have won by fighting for them generation after generation, those nations will have to preserve by keeping ready to fight in their defense. The only complete answer to these arguments in favor of using force in defense of liberty is that liberty is not worth the cost. In free countries to-day very few persons hold that opinion.

CHARLES W. ELIOT.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN HAWAII.

Mr. SHAFROTH, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to which was referred the bill (S. 2380) granting to the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii additional powers relative to elections and qualification of electors, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 108) thereon.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2710) granting the consent of Congress to Webbers Falls Railroad Co., a corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River, between the towns of Webbers Falls and Gore, in the State of Oklahoma, and I submit a report (No. 107) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

AMENDMENTS TO WAR-REVENUE BILL.

Mr. WEEKS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HOLLIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WAR TAXATION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have here a pamphlet entitled "War Taxation," by Mr. Otto H. Kahn, of New York. I make the request that the pamphlet be published as a Senate document. In making the request I assume that the pamphlet will have to be referred to the Committee on Printing for report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the pamphlet will be referred to the Committee on Printing for report.

DISPOSITION OF POTASH LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. HUSTING. On Saturday last I moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium and adopted the several amendments to it. The bill was reported out by the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am a member. I was not present when the bill was presented as far as I can recollect, at least I was not present when it was ordered reported out. Last Friday in the morning hour the bill was taken up. I was not aware that the bill was to be taken up, and only appeared in the Senate as the bill was about to be finally passed. I say this by way of explanation of my motion to reconsider. I did not know that any amendment had been adopted when I entered the Chamber. Neither was I able to give any particular attention to the text of the bill. I now find upon looking at the bill that its entire theory has been changed—at least I think so, and so maintain—by the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

As is well known, some years ago it became the policy of this Government no longer to issue patents to land except in very small subdivisions, and it was decided that valuable mineral lands should be leased, not patented. There has been a great deal of discussion on this question and a great deal of contention about it. This bill was reported by the committee, I understand, on the theory—and I think the text of the bill will bear out my statement—that prospecting permits were to be issued to cover four sections of land not known to contain potash deposits; that upon discovery a patent might issue for a section of land as a reward for that discovery; that all known deposits were to be leased, and when the Government saw fit the work was to be operated by the Government. The amendment of the Senator from Utah entirely changes that rule and goes back to the old policy of giving patents to land known to contain valuable ore deposits. These words were stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Utah:

not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described.

The bill as reported by the committee provided as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant who is a citizen of the United States, an association of such citizens, or a corporation organized under the laws of any State or Territory thereof, a prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of potassium * * * on lands of the United States not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described for a period of not exceeding two years.

The language to which I have referred was stricken out, so that the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to grant—

A prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates—except lands in San Bernardino County, Cal.

And so forth—

So, while the permit purports to be a prospecting permit, it may be nothing of the kind, because without any prospecting a patent may be acquired on lands known to contain potash and other minerals. Mr. President, that entirely wipes out the idea of rewarding with a patent the discoverer of mineral deposits; it entirely wipes out the justification of the proposed change in our policy by which we were to encourage prospecting, and goes right straight back to the old idea of parceling out valuable deposits of potash and other minerals and giving a patent to land where it is known that potash does exist.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator realize that if there are any known deposits of potassium they have been located and consequently would be acquired under the laws as they now exist? Was it not proven before the committee that the known deposits as to which the committee was supposed to legislate were at Searles Lake, Cal.?

Mr. HUSTING. If this bill referred only to Searles Lake, Cal., there would not be any question about it, but it relates to all potash deposits at Searles Lake and all other localities. I will ask the Senator if it does not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly, it relates to prospecting for such deposits. We do not want the lands of the United States which might be explored for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not they contained potassium, locked up, as has been the condition heretofore.

Mr. HUSTING. I ask the Senator from Colorado why the words "not known to contain valuable deposits" were stricken out?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will tell the Senator why that was done. That language would have been confusing to the prospector. "Not known" to whom? To whom is that fact supposed to be known? Is the prospector going upon the public domain and attempt to ascertain the fact and then have somebody say, "I knew that; I live in this community, and I knew that there was potassium there"? There would be nothing upon which the prospector could rely if those words were left in the bill. As a matter of fact, he could not tell what land to prospect. If he goes to the Government, is it going to be so that the Government shall say, "Some clerk in the Government knew that it was potassium land," or "Some person in the neighborhood knew that it was"? The language is indefinite. That is the reason it was stricken out. There would not be any exploration or any development of these resources if those words were retained in the bill.

Mr. HUSTING. Searles Lake is one of the places which are known to contain such deposits.

Mr. PITTMAN. But that is excepted from this provision.

Mr. HUSTING. Then that shows that these potash deposits are known and may be known. The Senator from Utah pointed out the other day that valuable deposits of potash are known to exist in the State of Utah.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I warrant that if the Senator from Wisconsin will ask the Senator from Utah he will say that all those deposits have been taken up under the mining laws, and consequently would not come within the permit system which is being imposed by this bill.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, this is a great, vast country, and I do not think any man is in a position to say that all the known areas of potash have been taken up; but if they have been taken up, what difference would it make to leave in the words "not known to contain valuable deposits of potash"?

The long and short of it is that this amendment simply wipes out the policy of conserving for the people of the United States the known mining fields by giving them out only one lease, and goes back to the old discredited policy that scandalized the country a few years ago of permitting men to seize and receive a patent for valuable deposits.

Not only that, but such lands going to patent would not be governed by the restrictions which one Senator desired only to apply to Searles Lake, namely, as to the question of price and the question of disposition. We have a provision in this bill that the Government may fix the price and control the disposition of the potash mines of this country if, in the judgment of the President, it is necessary for our own domestic use.

Under this bill discoverers of potash other than in the Searles Lake region will be permitted to own in fee the potash deposits, to mine and to sell it to the public for whatever they can get, and to export it without any power of control on the part of the Government.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this matter, and to say that on last Friday the Senate went on record in favor of an amendment which gives the President the right to control the price and the disposition of potash deposits. I consider that a very vital thing, Mr. President. There are other bills which are going to come in here relating to oil, relating to the leasing of lands generally, and this is the entering wedge. I considered it my duty to point out these facts, to object to the measure as amended, and not to permit it to pass the Senate without objection on my part as a member of the Committee on Public Lands.

There is another matter to which I desire to call attention in regard to this bill, which I think is important, and to remedy which an amendment ought to be passed. The bill gives a broad permit for prospecting on four sections of land, as I understand—and if I am wrong I want to be corrected—and while it is claimed to be a potash-prospecting bill, yet under its terms if any other mineral is discovered aside from potash the fee to the land is turned over to the prospector, so that all of the mineral deposits in the section patented would also be included in the fee. Thus the prospector would be in a position to patent oil discoveries or coal discoveries, without any of the restrictions which might be imposed upon these minerals under other laws.

This bill, for instance, imposes a royalty on potash produced, to run for a period of 50 years; but if the prospector discovers coal or oil on the land, I find nothing in this bill that would make him pay any royalty on the coal or oil so discovered; in fact, the coal or oil would become the property of the patentee, freed of all restrictions which the Government has seen fit to impose upon discoveries of oil elsewhere, and this even though the discovery of oil or coal might be incidental.

There is another feature to which I desire to call attention. Under color of this bill, in order to relieve himself of any obligation, I believe it would be very easy for any man to pretend to prospect for potash or take out a potash permit and then discover coal or oil which he might know was there. Then he would be under no obligation to the Government under the potash provision of the bill; but under the cloak of a potash permit he could get the fee to all the coal and oil underlying the land. That is a very nice little game if anybody wants to play it in that way. That some will play it in that way, or may do so, I do not think the Government has any reason to doubt. I understand it has been done in the past.

I know there are some cases now pending where claim is made to oil deposits where the prospecting was done under a permit to search for some entirely different mineral, and now an oil claim is maintained under a permit to seek a pretended deposit of another substance. Millions of dollars' worth of property is now claimed under permits which, at least on their face, never authorized discovery of oil at all.

There is no need of our being deceived in this matter. If Congress wants to go back to the old scandals and the old method of throwing away the birthright of the people, they can do so; but let them do so frankly and openly and not under the cloak of pretending to pass a leasing bill. I think that this bill in its present form is the worst bill that has been proposed to Congress on this particular subject, at least since I have been a Member of the Senate.

Does anyone know any good reason why any man should be given a section of land, almost for the asking, when the discovery of a potash deposit has already been made? Senators inquire, Who knows where there are any deposits? I do not know; I do not suppose that any of the Senators do; but I have no doubt that many citizens do know, and that they are waiting for the passage of this bill to get a patent to potash lands which are just waiting to be picked up, and these parties know where to pick them up.

The Senator from Utah stated that there were a great many potash deposits in the State of Utah. I have no doubt that many citizens of Utah know where to find them, and will be quick to take out patents as soon as this bill is passed.

We are importing potash in great quantities. There is a scarcity of potash in the world. Our potash supply comes and can only come now from Chile. We are building boats to try to carry necessary commodities to Europe. Every boat that we can spare is being used in the trans-Atlantic trade; and yet, while we are in such dire need of potash, we are going to make it possible for anyone to pick up potash on public lands and either sell it to the people of the United States at from $400 to $500 a ton, which is, I think, something like ten times its former value, or to sell it to our enemies, or at least to foreign countries, so that the mining of these deposits will not inure to the benefit of this country, but will inure only to the benefit of the gentlemen who get the patents.

Something has been said here about considering the feelings or the interests of the prospector. I want again to emphasize the fact that I do not believe the known minerals in the ground, such as we term our natural resources, like coal, oil, potash, and minerals of that character, were created for the benefit of the prospector or put into the ground by Providence solely in the interest of the prospector. I believe that they are the common property of the people of the United States and that the prospector or whoever is going to mine potash or other minerals is merely a public agent to get it from the ground and deliver it to the people of this country for their use and for the fertilization of their soil.

If that is not what it is there for, then I do not know what it is there for.

It is very easy to give these things away without any restrictions. It is very nice to be pleasant to people and to turn over to them things that they think they have a better right to have than anybody else; but for myself I want to say that I would not feel justified, as a trustee of a great trust, to so dissipate the funds of my cestui que trust.

I was asked a question here the other day, when this matter was up, about how I would feel if I were a prospector. I want to reply again to that question and say that it is not the question as to how I would feel if I were a prospector. The question that interests me is. How do I feel as a trustee of something that has been put into my hands, in common with others, for the purpose of conserving that trust?

The cestui que trust is the United States and the people of the United States. This trust is here to be executed by the trustee, according to the way he interprets his oath of office, according to what he considers his duty. That is the plain question.

Would any Senator in this Chamber, as a trustee for any estate, take that estate and give it over to a man upon his own terms, regardless of the interests of the estate, without due regard to the interests of the owners of the trust estate? I say he can not do it, and you can not justify it, in my judgment. Now, with known potash deposits lying in the ground for anybody to come in and take and sell, when we need the potash in this country, is it not our duty in permitting some State or Federal agent to take it out, whether it is a corporation or whether it is an individual, to give it to him under such terms that we can fulfill the trust?

I can not see two sides to that proposition. I say that we are not justified in turning over these potash deposits without any restrictions whatever.

We need the potash here. It is ours. We can do what we please with it. We can let those who develop it make all the money out of it that they ought to make for the service that they render. After it gets out of our hands it is too late, but now we are in a position to dictate the terms. Why should we not now, as a matter of fairness to the people, as a matter that greatly concerns the welfare of this country, put in those leases a stipulation that the people who take up potash lands shall earn a reasonable amount on their investment, and that when in the judgment of the President it is necessary to keep that potash here for the purpose of fertilizing our own soil it shall be sold within the boundaries of the United States?

We see what the old system is doing now. I do not want to go over the same ground twice, but I can point to the coal situation as a most admirable example of what sometimes happens in case of emergency when the Government divests itself of an authority of which it never should have divested itself.

To-day we have a coal shortage in the Northwest that threatens to result in people freezing to death. I have in my possession figures which go to show that since the opening of shipping on the Great Lakes millions of tons of shipping have gone up the Great Lakes empty—light, as it is called. These boats bring down loads of ore from Superior to Lake Erie ports, and then go back empty. What is the result in regard to the coal supply? In the State of Wisconsin to-day there is not, I venture to say, 10 per cent of the coal supply necessary to keep our people from freezing to death, in the coal docks or in the local warehouses. I do not know how it is in the two Dakotas, but I understand they are in the same condition, and that northern Iowa and Minnesota face a serious coal shortage, too.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very much interested in the Senator's argument; but I want to say, for his information, that one of the railroad and warehouse commissioners of the State of Minnesota was here the other day, and he said to me that for the purpose of making the investigation he took a trip by water from Duluth across the Lakes. He said he met some 30 boats empty, but he said it was not due to the fact that there was no coal but the fact was that the coal went in other directions, because they received a bigger profit. That was his statement—that there was plenty of coal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I want the RECORD to show also that some of these coal operators have been insisting all the time that they could not get boats in which to ship their coal up the Lakes. I think the information of the Senator from North Dakota is correct.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; it is correct. The statement was made to me by Mr. Jacobson, from St. Paul, Minn., who has made the investigation.

Mr. HUSTING. It may be that the coal was diverted elsewhere. I am not just at this moment trying to fix the blame; but the vitally important thing is that there is no coal in Wisconsin. I do not know the exact situation in the Senator's State, but there is no coal in Wisconsin. I am informed that outside of Milwaukee, where they have 70 per cent of the normal supply, the amount of coal in the State is negligible; only 10 or 15 per cent of the winter's needs, with the winter only a little over a month away.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator that we are very short of coal in my State. In fact, the little flouring mills are complaining bitterly, not so much because the prices are high but because they can not get it. I have taken up the question with the governor of our State, asking him to instruct the people of that State to begin the mining of lignite coal and not to depend upon the eastern supply.

Mr. HUSTING. The point I am making now is that notwithstanding millions of tons of shipping have gone up the Lakes empty since the opening of navigation, we have only 10 or 15 per cent of the coal supply necessary to keep our people from freezing to death in Wisconsin. Now we are running around to find out who is to blame. You go to the coal operators and they say that the railroads will not furnish cars either to take the coal West or to Lake Erie ports. You go to the railroads and they say the operators will not furnish them the coal. Here we have one public utility, and another industry that ought to be a public utility, which we ought to be able to get together in one place and say, "We want the coal, because we have got to have it or we will freeze to death." Yet we are in this impotent situation where we can not help ourselves. The coal is mined; the shipping is there, ready to take it, going up the Lakes empty. The railroads are there, and yet, notwithstanding the fact that we have the coal, we have the railroads, and we have the shipping and the dock facilities, we have not got any coal. It does not interest the people very much to know just who is to blame, because when people freeze to death it will not interest them very much after they are dead as to who caused their death. But it is a matter of vital concern to be able to say to somebody, "Do this, do that, and give us the coal."

I have some figures that I am going to ask permission to put in the RECORD at some future time, showing that in order to supply the Northwest with the coal necessary to keep the people from freezing to death we have got to ship by boat, in addition to what the railroads would carry, three million three hundred and seventy-seven thousand and odd tons a month between now and the close of navigation next December. Here we are in the middle of August, with cold weather coming on in Wisconsin in September or the beginning of October, with nothing being accomplished, no coal moving, and we are at the mercy of the men that have these things that ought to be within our control.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I do

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator think it would relieve the coal situation if the billions and billions of tons of coal that exist in the Rocky Mountain region were permitted to be mined?

Mr. HUSTING. Not at all, I will say to the Senator, when there are millions and millions of tons lying right here ready to be moved that are not moved. It is not a question of coal; it is a question of getting it to the furnaces to heat our houses. The coal is mined There is not any scarcity of coal. There is plenty of it. It is lying there ready to be shipped, and yet it is not being shipped. They are debating between themselves who is going to carry the coal, how much coal they are going to get, and how much they are going to charge for the coal.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that so far as my State and the other Western States are concerned, in our country those who have patented lands to coal have the monopoly by reason of the fact that the other lands are not permitted to be entered. That creates a monopoly and permits them to charge a higher price and hold up the people. It is that condition that we are trying to relieve in connection with the coal situation and the situation as to potassium.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As I understand the Senator from Wisconsin, the very point he is making is that in the future we should so guard the granting of title to the mineral lands and the coal lands and the other public resources of the country that the condition which the Senator from Colorado admits exists in his State can not recur. The Senator from Colorado admits that the people who have acquired the coal lands, who have fee-simple titles to them and are beyond the control of the Government, are establishing a monopoly of the coal and charging people extortionate prices for it; and yet the Senator, as I understand, advocates a continuance of that policy.

Now, in the eastern part of the country, in the coal regions, practically all the coal lands have already passed into private hands—just the condition that the Senator says he wants to see established in the West——

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just let me finish the sentence and then I will yield to the Senator—and yet in the East, with what is claimed to be a sufficient natural supply of coal in the ground, and all of it owned by private individuals, there is still a coal monopoly, a coal famine, and extortionate prices.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to say a word in reply to the Senator from Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to answer the Senator. However, I yield to him, and after that I should like to say a few words.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to say just a word with relation to the policy to which the Senator has referred.

I am a believer in the theory that competition will bring down the price of coal. It has done so in the past, and except in this war period we have had in the history of the United States the lowest-priced coal production of any country in the world. When coal sells at the mouth of the mine in West Virginia at 90 cents a ton, and in Pennsylvania at $1.06 a ton, you can readily see that it is not in the operation of the mine that any monopoly exists. It is this competition between the mines of the various States that has brought about that low price of coal, and ships from all over the world try to get into Hampton Roads for the purpose of getting the low-priced coal which has existed there. Now there is a war, and conditions have arisen that have made the price higher; but, notwithstanding that, under ordinary conditions, conditions that have existed in this country for 50 years, that competition has brought down the price of the coal to a point lower than in any other country in the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me just one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As I understand the Senator, he argues that competition will take care of the situation. That is the old argument, and yet it seems to me, if the Senator is entirely consistent in claiming that competition is all that is necessary, it is quite strange that he has been voting here for the last two or three years for bills to restrain unfair competition, to put in the hands of the Government the power to fix prices, to create a food and fuel commission, to establish a Federal Trade Commission, the passage of the Clayton Antitrust Act, in addition to all the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and so forth. If the Senator thinks that these natural laws of competition are all that is necessary, and they are now in operation, why is it that we hear this outcry throughout the length and breadth of the land for fuel at reasonable prices?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Washington has asked me a question, and I want to answer it.

Mr. HUSTING. I am afraid the Senator will have to answer it in his own time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will take only a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I shall have to refuse to yield to the Senator at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator says that coal is cheap. We have not got any coal. What difference does it make to us in Wisconsin if they sell coal at $1 a ton in West Virginia, if it is not mined and transported to a point where we can buy it? The fact that the people of Europe come into Hampton Roads and get coal out of this country and ship the coal back to Europe does not interest the people in Wisconsin very much, when Wisconsin can not get the coal necessary to keep the people of that State warm in the winter. We have got to have coal when our temperature goes down sometimes to 20° and even 30° below zero. The people have got to have coal there to live.

The Senator's suggestion about the West may or may not be in accord with my views of the matter, but I am talking now of this concrete situation.

I say as a general principle that to go now and lease or patent new mining areas where coal exists, where there will be competition, where the owners can sell the coal cheap if they want to, where they can produce an abundance of coal, what good will it do the people of the West if those who mine the coal say, "This is my property, and I will not sell it"; or, "I will not sell it unless you pay four times what it is worth"? What good will this coal do the people if the railroads say, "We will not transport it if we do not choose to transport it." That does not get the coal to the market. We are in a situation where we are rich in coal supply, in coal deposits, but the people are poor in coal for their own use.

Now, what is the trouble? The trouble is that it is somebody's property; at least, they claim it is. I hold that the theory is wrong, and I believe that a bill can be enacted which will hold water, that will bring coal operations and coal mining into the public-utility class, as a matter of necessity to the people, and as a matter affecting the public interest. I believe we can, under such a law, constitutionally regulate the production, the price, and the disposition of coal. I am going to introduce a bill of that kind as soon as I can get it drawn up. But we are helpless now.

I say we have the coal and we have given it away. We stimulated private enterprise. We have not gone into the socialistic idea of providing ourselves with the means to get coal. We have simply just given it away to be prospected by men who are developing the country, the men whose enterprise is so necessary for the welfare of the country. What is the result? We have not got any coal. That is the result. And we have not got any means to enforce the obtaining of coal, or we did not have until a few days ago. I do not know how we are going to enforce it now.

There is a way now to bring about relief if we can do it, and that is to tell the railroads to furnish cars to the coal operators, and then to tell the coal operators to fill those cars, and then tell the railroad companies to take those cars to the Erie ports, put them on boats, and bring them up the Lakes, and distribute them around the docks where the coal may be available to the people.

I have digressed from this bill. But here it appears we are going to do the same thing over again. When deposits of potash will be developed, when our farmers will be crying for potash as they are crying now, what will they get? They will get nothing. The potash will also go down to Hampton Roads and to some other country, where it will be used for the fertilization of soil. We may be rich in potash deposits and potash supplies, and will be poor in the supply of potash available for our use, or potash will only be available at such a price as will make it worthless for the purpose for which it is wanted.

Are we going to repeat mistakes of that kind over again? Are we going with our eyes open voluntarily to divest ourselves of all control as to the production, price, and disposition of the coal or the potash or the oil or the other things that people are going to need? To me it seems absolutely unbelievable that we, the people of the United States, having it in our possession, in our hands as trustees not only for ourselves but for posterity, but primarily, at least, for ourselves, that we shall repeat the blunders, the crimes that have been committed in letting these things pass out of our hands so that we are absolutely at the mercy of selfish men?

I want the Government to maintain jurisdiction over a thing so vitally necessary to the life and welfare of our citizens, whether it is coal, or oil, or potash, or anything else we need. Is that asking anything unreasonable? Will any Senator here in this Chamber or any Member of the other House say that if we had these things in our hands and owed a duty to those who had entrusted us with these things he would be justified in consulting the pleasure of the men who are exploiting our riches and after exploiting our riches exploit our people with our riches? I say, in my judgment, you can not justify it.

Now, here we are in the potash business. I think the bill before it passes ought to be amended so as to stimulate potash development, and when I say potash development I do not mean to permit men under the cloak of looking for potash to get into the oil fields or to get into the coal fields and seize our oil and seize our coal, which they may do under this bill, for not only does the bill divest us of all control but it meets none of the terms imposed by other laws on other minerals.

I hope the bill will be reconsidered so that if a potash bill is to pass it will be a people's potash bill, not a prospector's bill; a people's potash bill, not a speculator's potash bill; a potash bill that will give the United State potash at a reasonable price in reasonable quantities at seasonable times when it is needed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I intend to take only about three minutes. The Senator from Wisconsin has charged the coal operators with having held back the coal when the country is starving for coal, while they discussed where the coal should go. I think I have observed the same characteristics in this body on several occasions. For three years we have been trying to get a potash bill passed. During most of that time the Senator from Wisconsin has been upon the Public Lands Committee and assisted in framing it. Some of the objections he now makes to this bill should have been made in committee by him.

When this bill was finally ready for passage there were certain amendments suggested by Senators. Those amendments were indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior and then the bill was reported out.

I realize that if the Senator had been in the committee after the amendments came back from the Department of the Interior he would probably have insisted upon the committee permitting him to redraft the bill and present it to the Senate, and I have no doubt that in his wisdom he could have redrafted it far better than all the rest of the committee; at least there would have been no suspicion attached to the bill if he had drawn it and presented it himself. Now it labors under the suspicion which he has referred to.

The chief objection of the Senator from Wisconsin is that the Government retains no control over the potash. I have heard him say that a dozen times. As a matter of fact, the only real supply of potash in the country, as testified to by the Department of the Interior, and by all the experts in the department, is Searles Lake. Congress appropriated nearly $300,000 to prospect for potash in this country. The experts spent nearly three years prospecting for potash, and they did not find any potash that amounted to anything. I have the testimony here in the hearing. Mr. Pennock, who is the chief chemical expert of the advisory committee, testified as follows:

> But as far as I have gone in accumulating this data, in getting this information, I find that there is but a very small amount of potash available outside of Searles Lake—Searles Lake, San Bernardino County, Cal.

As a matter of fact, there is not any of commercial importance outside of it.

Now, the situation is here. We have two functions to perform by this bill. One of them is to work the known deposits, and the other is to stimulate real prospectors to find other deposits. You have never heard of a mining expert discovering deposits. They do not do it. It is the prospectors who discover them. You have spent $300,000 of the people's money seeking potash deposits outside of Searles Lake, and where are they? If you will encourage the prospectors to go out and look for potash, they will find it.

This bill takes care of the known potash. It is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior and Mr. Pennock that the bill offers encouragement which it is hoped will induce prospectors to find more potash.

Now, what does it do as to Searles Lake? Searles Lake contains 20,000,000 tons of potash, enough to last this country at least 10 or 15 years' time, while we are finding more potash. As to that deposit, this bill says that the Government may operate it itself or it may let a lease and reserve in that lease the right to fix the price of the potash; that it may reserve in that lease the right to fix the disposition of the potash.

Now, then, this bill does give the Government absolute control of the known potash in this country; and I want to say this, and it will occur immediately to any common-sense man as a fact, that if the Government has control of 20,000,000 tons of potash it will make no difference how much potash some one else owns in this country; the price of it will have to come down to the level that the Government fixes on the 20,000,000 tons. The consumption of potash in this country is only 520,000 tons a year. It is a limited amount, and with the Government having 20,000,000 in its hands it can control the market at any price it sees fit. It will control the price of all the outside product, and everyone knows it.

There is absolutely nothing in the contention the Senator from Wisconsin has made. That is not what we regret. We came in here last week on Thursday, took this bill, and debated it the whole morning hour, and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin took his part in it. He enlightened the Senate then as he does now. Then when we took up the bill again on Saturday he came in during the latter part of the debate, after every amendment was passed, and asked unanimous consent that we open up the proceedings so that he could offer an amendment. As the Senator having charge of the bill, I joined in that request for unanimous consent, and it was granted. He offered his amendment, his amendment was adopted, and then he sat silently in his seat and saw this bill passed. Now he comes in with a motion to reconsider. It is apparent that if the bill is reconsidered it will be discussed eternally and will finally die in this body as it has died before. If he were deeply interested in the welfare of the farmers of this country, instead of standing here and talking the bill to death he would be going to the other House and going before the committee that will have it under consideration and urge upon them the amendment he thinks essential.

I certainly hope that after the bill has been unanimously indorsed by practically a full committee, after it has been indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior and indorsed by the Council of National Defense, this body will not bring it back here to be discussed for weeks and weeks, to interfere with the existing business, and to die on this floor. I sincerely ask that we be allowed to retain the legislation.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I do not suppose it will interest the Senate very much to know just what happened in the committee, but as long as we are talking about it I should like to state why I was not better informed on this bill. It is true the bill had been up in one shape or another for a year, not three years. I have only been here a little over a year. I opposed this kind of a bill on the same ground that I am opposing it now. I have not made any secret about it. But the last I knew about the status in the committee of the general land-leasing bill, which contained provisions for the mining of potash was when my clerk was told by the clerk of the Committee on Public Lands that the hearings on the bill were indefinitely postponed. I knew nothing to the contrary; I supposed the matter was going over for the session. I had offered a substitute and asked to have it printed. When I returned I found a meeting of the committee had been called that morning and the committee had not considered, or at least there is no record of its having considered, the substitute that I had put in the hands of the committee, and I found that this bill had been reported in the morning I arrived here from Wisconsin. I was gone only 10 days. I do not think it would have been any great stretch of courtesy to have waited a day longer for the consideration of the general land-leasing bill and this particular bill. I do not feel that it would have been a stretch of courtesy, inasmuch as I had a substitute for the general land-leasing bill, to have given me an opportunity to present the substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say that the Senator is under a misapprehension concerning the matter of consideration by the committee. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was here. It was the desire of some of the members of the committee that the bill should go over. Such was my desire, and I requested that it should go over. But the Senator from Montana said that he could not return that it had to be done that day or he could not be present. Inasmuch as the Senator from Montana had given this subject consideration for the last four years and he thought it ought to be done immediately, the committee did consider the bill then.

Mr. HUSTING. When I was present the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was absent. When it was stated that the Senator from Montana wanted to be present at the last meeting I attended and he was absent because of illness in his family, I readily acquiesced in the postponement so that the Senator from Montana could be present. Now, of course, when I was absent and the Senator from Montana was present I can not see any better reason, inasmuch as I have offered a minority bill, why, under the circumstances, the bill could not have been put over just 24 hours to enable me to appear before the committee and present my substitute and discuss the matter. Not only that, but why should this particular matter have been brought up in the Senate at a time when I was not aware that it was going to be called up?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. I do not know that I was entitled to any notice, but at the same time I do feel that it would not have been entirely out of order to have intimated at least to me that the bill was coming up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I wish to say in regard to the proceedings of the committee that I was not only requested but urged by a number of the members of the committee to call a committee meeting for the day on which the meeting was to be, and in accordance with my custom whenever a number of members of the committee have asked me to have a meeting I always granted it. The day was the regular day of the committee meeting, Wednesday, when the committee is always supposed to meet unless the meeting is dispensed with for some purpose. The committee meeting was called in the regular way on a regular meeting day, and there was a quorum present, more than a quorum. A majority of those present saw fit to go ahead and transact business, which of course it was in their power to do.

I may say, personally, as far as I am concerned, I did not know that the Senator from Wisconsin was especially anxious to be present. I supposed he had gotten his notice through the mail the same as any other member. Of course, he was not here to receive it, but I did not even know that he was absent from the city on that day, and I did not know that he was especially anxious to be present at all or else I would have endeavored to use every means to give him every courtesy and consideration at my hands.

The Senator from Wisconsin never spoke to me about desiring to be present. He refers to some meeting of the committee when he was present, and my colleague [Mr. WALSH], who is interested in this legislation, being the author of a bill on the subject, was not present, and that the bill went over on that account. I have no knowledge of that. I think at that meeting I was surely not present, and that the meeting must have been presided over by some other member of the committee.

I assure the Senator there was no intentional discourtesy whatever, or desire to deny him any consideration. The bill was ordered to be reported by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]; he being the author of the bill, the privilege of reporting it was naturally given to him. Further than that I know nothing about it.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Montana that he is entirely correct in his statement; he was not present, and the Senator from Nevada was the presiding officer at the time I mention. It is natural that my absence should be unnoticed, and I would not think that I was entitled to any notice and do not think so now, except for the fact that I had gone to the trouble of preparing a substitute for the general land-leasing bill and had asked to have it printed. It was neither printed at the time nor considered.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, just one word further. I did not say that the Senator's absence was unnoticed. I did notice it; I was aware of his absence; but a number of other members of the committee were also absent. It is never the case that every one of the 17 members of the committee is present. There were quite a number of other absentees on that day; but there being more than a quorum present, of course, the matter was in the hands of the committee to do as it might see fit.

Mr. HUSTING. I would not mention this at all, for I do not think it interests the Senate very much, and it is taking up the time of the Senate, except for the statement made by the Senator from Nevada, that I only now come in and object, when the fact of the matter is that I never had a real opportunity to object at the time the bill was printed, passed upon by the committee, and reported to the Senate, and only accidentally happened to come on the floor at the time the bill was being considered, expecting that the revenue measure was going to be taken up.

So far as my showing any interest in this bill is concerned, I think the Senator will bear me out that it was the Senator from Minnesota and myself who offered these particular amendments pertaining to the price and disposition of potash.

Now, coming down to the statement of the Senator that there are no potash deposits in the United States, I should like to quote the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. Last Friday he made this statement in response to the Senator from Nevada, who had just made the statement that there are no other such deposits:

> Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, Senator. My opinion is that if we adopt that amendment and leave it entirely with the President at all times hereafter to regulate the price, the further prospecting for potash in this country will be limited indeed.
> I wish to say to the Senator just another word. I have not the least doubt but what within the State of Utah there will be hundreds of thousands of tons of potash produced from lands that are now known to contain potash, discovered a very short time ago. I know of a number of cement plants in the West that are now putting in machinery for the purpose of extracting the potash that is found in the cinders, that are ultimately ground up, from which cement is made. I have seen a statement from one company in which it is claimed tests have been made and found to contain 1 per cent, and in many cases more, of potash, and the company has already ordered the machinery and is going to put it in operation in connection with the cement plant, and is going to produce thousands and thousands of tons of potash from that source.

I think that effectually disposes of that contention, because not only is that fact known, but they have already ordered the machinery and are ready to take out of the ground potash which does not belong to them and are ready to take it out of land which they are, no doubt, going to patent under this bill. These are known potash lands. They are getting the machinery on the ground and have got the ground located and are only waiting for this bill to pass so that they can get a fee-simple title to the potash land and obtain it without restriction as to price or distribution.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the Senator know that this land is withdrawn?

Mr. HUSTING. Answering that, I will say that the Senator from Utah said this further:

> I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist upon his amendment, because if it is adopted I feel quite sure the prospecting will be retarded and will be limited to almost nothing in the future.

In other words, if this amendment passes the activity that he has been talking about will cease. That is the inference which I draw from the remark.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Nevada does not draw any such inference, because these are located mining claims, and located mining claims can not be on reserved land. These men by their discovery already own that land without any further legislation.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator from Utah has not said so, though it may be true; I do not know; but the Senator from Nevada made the statement that there was only one potash deposit in this country that was worth talking about and that was the Searles Lake potash deposit.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. And I merely cite the statement of the Senator from Utah to prove that there are hundreds of thousands of tons of potash ready to be taken out of the ground by machinery which is already ordered and which is to be put on the ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Nevada did not say that on his own authority; the Senator from Wisconsin may say something on his own authority, but with regard to these matters I quoted from the hearings and from the report containing a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, wherein it is stated that the only deposit of any importance whatever is that at Searles Lake.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood the Senator, but a few moments ago the Senator made the argument here that it is useless to discuss this question, because it could only relate to the Searles Lake area, and that the quantity of potash in this country was negligible.

Mr. PITTMAN. And that is true.

Mr. HUSTING. And that this bill could practically affect only one deposit. I simply call the attention now of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Utah stated that there were lands in Utah where thousands and thousands of tons of potash are going to be taken out of the ground.

I do not admit that if the Senator from Wisconsin had had the drafting of this bill it would be perfect, but I do say that the bill as drafted by those who did draft it is not perfect. The Senator says something about suspicion that has been directed against this bill. I have been speaking of what I conceive to be facts, and the Senator has not denied them. I say that under the cloak of this potash bill, under its terms, men can go in and prospect for coal and oil and other minerals, and if they receive a patent, as they will be entitled to, and get the land in fee, they then will own whatever coal and oil may be found in the land.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I never attempted to answer that question at all, because that matter was twice considered by the Public Lands Committee of the other House and twice considered by the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, and the same language on that subject has been adopted in bills which have twice passed the House. Therefore the committee did not attempt to change it. The language provides that the discovery must be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior passes upon the discovery.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nevada whether it is not a fact, under the provisions of this bill, that anyone getting a prospecting permit to mine potash, in the event that he got a fee, would be entitled to all coal and oil which might be found on the premises? I do not suggest that as a matter of suspicion; I say that under the terms of the bill I think they can do that. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether or not that is true?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the history of mining does not disclose the fact that potash is found in connection with oil or with coal or with gas, except possibly in this body. It is an entirely separate proposition. If a man is a bona fide prospector for potash, he will go into that geological formation where potash is supposed to be and will engage in that character of mining. If he discovers potash under conditions satisfactory to the Department of the Interior, he will get a patent; but there is not one case, I will venture to say, in a thousand where there would be either oil or coal in lands being prospected for potash.

As I have said, those matters were discussed before the Public Lands Committee of the House and of the Senate time and time again in connection with the general leasing bill. This language was adopted for the very reason I have stated, namely, that the committee did not believe that it could be utilized for the purpose of obtaining other minerals. That was the reason of it, and because, if the discoverer were not given a fee, prospecting for these minerals would be interfered with by men who were pretending to mine for other kinds of minerals.

The great trouble is to get men to prospect. We know what to do with our known deposits, and we are doing it. This bill proposes to let the Government work them if it desires to do so, or to lease them if it so desires, as it sees fit. As to the vast field of speculative potash, we are trying to get somebody to prospect for it.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator did not answer the question that I asked. I do not know whether he cares to do so; but my question was, in the event coal or oil were to be found, whether under this bill they would not become the absolute property of the patentee free of all restrictions.

Mr. PITTMAN. I stated that that was entirely with the Secretary of the Interior under the bill, as he has the absolute arbitrary determination of the question of the discovery of potash.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to repeat that, according to my interpretation—and nothing the Senator has said controverts it, as I understand—under the terms of this bill any man once getting a patent to land owns all the minerals underlying that land, no matter what they are, whether oil, coal, or much more valuable minerals than potash itself. He not only gets the potash but he gets the coal and oil free of all the restrictions and terms imposed ordinarily upon discoverers of oil and coal.

The Senator from Nevada says that there is a leasing provision in this bill. The leasing provision at first was intended to apply to known potash lands, and when the bill was framed known potash lands under the terms of the bill were not to be subject to patent at all. The known potash deposits were all to be leased by the Government, and not an acre of them sold or put under patent. Now, however, by the changes made in the bill all lands known or unknown which contain potash are patentable.

Mr. PITTMAN. Except——

Mr. HUSTING. All are patentable in the last analysis under this bill; and who from the Senator's State or from any other State will lease a property when he can get it in fee upon about as good terms and perhaps better—I do not know but upon better terms?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator certainly does not mean to state that.

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; I mean to state that.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator does not mean to say that under the bill all known potash lands are open to location?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; Mr. President, the bill——

Mr. PITTMAN. Does not the bill say "except lands in San Bernardino County, Cal."?

Mr. HUSTING. Yes; I beg the Senators' pardon.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not want the Senator to make that error.

Mr. HUSTING. The bill provides "except lands in San Bernardino County, Cal." There is one county in the United States——

Mr. PITTMAN. Where all the potash is.

Mr. HUSTING. To which this bill does not apply. When I said all known and unknown potash lands I meant all except those in San Bernardino County, Cal. But who is going to be a tenant when he can be a landlord? We might just as well strike out the leasing provision from this bill, because no one is going to lease lands when he can get them as his own sole and separate property.

I submit to the Senate that this bill should be reconsidered. If we are going to patent any potash lands let us patent the unknown potash lands, so that, as under the first theory of the bill, men will have to discover the deposit before they can get patent and so that men can not get machinery on the ground ready to mine the potash known to them to be there before they get a patent; and, if we should give a patent, let us at least make the patent subject to the same terms as the leasehold.

For a moment consider the leasing provisions of this bill, which are, of course, inoperative; they do not mean anything, because nobody will take out a lease, except in San Bernardino County, Cal., under which the Government will have the right to fix the cost and control the disposition. We give the Government that power when the land is only leased, but when a patent is given we give the land to the patentee freed from all restrictions of that kind; in other words, the consideration for the lease is much greater to the Government than the consideration for the patent. When we lease a man potash lands we impose very harsh terms for the leasehold, at least we impose terms to safeguard the interests of the people of the United States; but when we give him a patent, then we give the land away without any restriction whatever. Is that logical? Is that wise statesmanship? Is that going to take care of the interests of the people of the country? I submit that it will not. If we are going to patent these lands, at least let us control the price and control the disposition of the products. I do not care to go over matters which have already been discussed; but I submit that this bill should be reconsidered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this question was very thoroughly discussed in the Senate on Friday last, and I think Senators are fully aware of what the bill contains. I think also that the Senate has reached the conclusion that anything that will encourage prospecting for potash in the United States and its development ought to be done. The Senator from Wisconsin seems to have the idea that men are perfectly willing to give their time and spend all the money they have on earth and all they can borrow from their friends to dig in the ground to find potash or other minerals, and that when found the minerals ought to be taken from them. Mr. President, that has not been the policy that has built up the great mining industry of the country in the past; it has not been the policy that has put into the arteries of trade in the United States billions of dollars of gold and silver and precious metals.

I am not going to discuss this question any further to-day, but I hope the Senate will vote against the motion to reconsider the vote whereby on Friday last the bill was passed almost by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McNary	Sheppard
Beckham	Hollis	Martin	Sherman
Brady	Husting	Myers	Simmons
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Swanson
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Thompson
Fletcher	Kendrick	Pittman	Trammell
France	King	Poindexter	Weeks
Gerry	Kirby	Reed	Williams
Gore	McCumber	Saulsbury
Gronna	McKellar	Shafroth

Mr. KING. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on very important business. I desire the announcement to stand for the day.

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SHIELDS and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. STERLING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to reconsider the vote by which the so-called potash bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

In the first place, I should like to say that I agree with the principle stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that a real prospector is entitled to the rewards of his enterprise, and for the kind of work that prospectors have to do, as every man who lives in the West knows. I do not understand, though, how the Senator from Utah can put in that class men who merely go upon land which is already known to contain the minerals desired and get an exclusive permit for that land, so far as prospecting for those minerals is concerned, followed by a right to obtain a fee-simple patent to it, to be followed, if desired, by their associates, who can obtain similar permits to all that is left of the land. The fact that it is known to contain minerals does not make any difference, so far as this act is concerned. They obtain patents to a certain portion of it. It is chiefly for that reason, and because the bill has that effect, rather than the effect which the Senator describes of rewarding diligent prospectors for their efforts, that I think the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin ought to prevail, and the bill ought to come back here for more mature and deliberate consideration.

What is the situation in regard to potash? Why, without taking up the time of the Senate to describe it at length, in just a word, if we accept the report of the majority of the committee, it is more eloquent in the figures it gives than any description which the imagination could possibly picture. It says, on page 2, that the normal price of potash is $40 a ton, while at the present time it is about $475 a ton. That is all that it is necessary to say to indicate the need for potash, and to indicate further the insufficient supply, and to indicate further the absolute control of the owners of that insufficient supply over the price, so that they can command from the Government or from the farmers who must have it, as is dwelt upon at length in this report, instead of the normal price of $40 a ton, $475 a ton.

What further is there as to the potash supply in the public lands of the United States? As I recollect, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] stated a moment ago that there were no potash deposits known in the United States outside, I believe he said, of Searles Lake.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I said that no deposits containing any large percentage of potassium were well known except a little in Utah. There is none in Colorado that I have ever heard of. At least, that was the testimony before the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that point, also, I will read just a line from the report of the committee. The report of the committee cites a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which I take as authoritative, because it is based on information from men whose sole business is to be informed about the public lands of the United States. I do not think it can be denied. It can not be said that the reports of the Secretary of the Interior are imaginative or irresponsible when they purport to give data as to the mineral resources of particular lands.

The Secretary in a letter dated May 11, 1917, addressed to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, makes this statement:

> Phosphate rock is present in large and valuable quantities in the public lands of Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Montana, and Florida, and approximately 2,400,000 acres containing such deposits are at present withdrawn. This mineral also is an exceedingly valuable element of fertilization of farm lands and the supply at reasonable prices would greatly stimulate our agricultural production.

I think the bill as it was reported by the committee was much better than in its present form, as amended after it left the committee. With the general purpose of it I am in entire sympathy, especially with the amendment which was adopted giving to the President of the United States the reserve power, to be used in case of necessity, to regulate the disposal of the potash—that is to say, whether it shall be shipped abroad or kept for use in this country—and to guarantee the consumers against extortionate prices. But as to the other amendments which were adopted by the Senate after the bill left the committee, which would enable a number of men, merely upon making an application to the Secretary of the Interior, to take this 2,400,000 acres of land and to obtain patents for it, without any reservation as to regulation of the disposal of the potash or as to guaranteeing against extortionate prices, I think it is a mistake. In view of the potash situation of the country, there is a sufficient reason for favorable action upon the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senate should have this bill returned and consider those phases of the matter with more care.

Now, a man wants potash lands, or a number of them want potash lands. He has here the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, as embodied in this report, that there are several million acres of phosphate rock lands, containing valuable potash elements, in certain States which are named. What has he to do in order to get that? It is not left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to grant him a permit or to withhold it; but if this man makes application under this bill as it is now amended the Secretary of the Interior is directed to give him a permit, and an exclusive permit, and to shut out anybody else.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield. This is the language of the bill:

> That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized—

It does not stop there—> and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant who is a citizen of the United States, an association of such citizens, or a corporation organized under the laws of any State or Territory thereof, a prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of potassium—

On the public lands of the United States; and deliberately, upon the amendment of the Senator from Utah, the bill has been so framed that the public lands of the United States, as there expressed, will include the 2,400,000 acres spoken of in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior which are already known to contain these minerals.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he is talking about phosphate rock and not about potassium. This bill relates to potassium, while that statement of the Secretary's relates to 2,400,000 acres of phosphate land. That is not potassium land at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is included in the language of this bill—"chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of potassium." Phosphate rocks include and contain carbonates and nitrates of potassium, and would be subject to entry under this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to reconsider the vote by which the potassium bill was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. HUSTING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

On a division, the motion to reconsider was rejected.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Missouri intend to address himself to the revenue bill?

Mr. REED. The bill has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I had hoped to speak on the bill. That is the reason why I asked.

Mr. REED. I expect to be very brief.

Mr. PENROSE. All right. The Senator always is.

Mr. REED. I ask to have inserted without reading an article setting forth Mr. Hoover's first official act. The article is printed in the New York American, but also appeared in the other leading papers of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on August 8 at about 4 p. m. Congress created a food dictator. On Sunday, August 12, at about 10 p. m. the dictator issued to the people of the United States his first decree.

So important a document deserves the serious attention of the Senate and of the country. It ought to be remembered historically, because it is the first time a single man has undertaken to control the markets of a free people.

Let it be observed that the moment Mr. Hoover was vested with dictatorial power he assumed the complete exercise of his autocratic prerogatives.

It ought to be an axiom in the philosophy of government that no man seeks power who does not intend to employ it; but yet, sir, when certain members of the Senate insisted that the powers granted by the food-control bill were dangerous they were constantly met with the assertion that the powers would never be employed.

For a few minutes let us consider Mr. Hoover's decree. We shall discover that he employs all the vast powers granted; nay, more, that he is prepared to abuse those powers.

First, let me direct your thought to the fact that Mr. Hoover endeavors to pave the way and to excuse the exercise of dictatorial power by claiming that there exists certain conditions which have deprived the farmer of his market, and that therefore it is necessary for Mr. Hoover to do the things outlined in his proclamation.

Mr. Hoover states:

> The allied Governments have placed the whole purchase of their supplies in the hands of one buyer. Also the European neutrals are now buying their wheat through single Government agents instead of in the normal course of commerce. Therefore, the export price of wheat and flour, and thus the real price, if not controlled, will be subject to almost a single will of the foreign purchaser.

Mr. President, the statement I have just read plainly implies that the country finds itself in an unfortunate condition against which Mr. Hoover now seeks to defend us, and that one of his means of defense is to ask control of the American market.

In connection with that statement I call attention to the fact that Mr. Hoover himself created or at least advised, consented, and abetted the creation of the very conditions he now employs as his excuse for seizing the grain markets of the United States.

I read from his testimony given before the Agricultural Committee, part 1, page 41:

Senator REED. And you do say you desire the power now to have the purchases for the allies made through one common agency, in order to stop that great element of speculation?
Mr. HOOVER. Yes, sir.
Senator REED. And you think that is very necessary and very essential?
Mr. HOOVER. I do.
Senator REED. Would you include in that the sale of all wheat and other grains that you propose to control that go to neutral countries?
Mr. HOOVER. I think it will be necessary to control neutral buying.
Senator REED. Then your proposition is to put into the hands of this agency all export business?
Mr. HOOVER. In wheat, at least.

At other places in his testimony Mr. Hoover repeatedly declared in substance and effect that he desired to create a single foreign purchasing agency for the very purpose of controlling our foreign market. I want the American farmer and the American people to understand that Mr. Hoover helped to set up and create this monopoly over the foreign market, and that therefore he can not masquerade as one who seeks to rescue us from the evils he helped create.

I next challenge attention to paragraph 4 of Mr. Hoover's statement, which is as follows:

4. There are large stocks of wheat which can not be drawn upon by the allies during the war, but in the event of peace or defeat of the submarines these would be available and might seriously demoralize the demand for American wheat.

Thus he undertakes to place himself before the American farmer in the attitude of one who proposes to protect the farmer against the demoralization of prices which might occur were the war to suddenly end. The reply is, first, there are no known stocks of wheat to more than supply the world's demand. There has not been an actual surplus of world's wheat produced within the last 15 or 20 years, and no such stock exists to-day. On the contrary, there is probably a very great world shortage to-day. If the war were to end suddenly, the people who are now eating wheat substitutes would simply begin to eat wheat, as they have for the last hundred years. If the war were to end to-day, it would be months before transportation facilities could be sufficient to carry to Europe all the food she demands. Remember, when peace comes starving Germany will cry for food. This will in itself create a great demand.

There is no reasonable possibility of the war ending suddenly. If there be such probability, the destruction of our usual methods of commerce and the seizure of the farmer's wheat is so much the more unjustifiable.

What right have we to interfere with all the business of the United States if we have reasonable ground to apprehend a sudden cessation of hostilities and the making of a world peace?

I call attention to paragraph 5 of Mr. Hoover's statement. It is:

5. It must be clearly understood that the guaranteed minimum price of $2 per bushel for wheat, set out in the food bill, does not apply to the 1917 harvest, but only to the 1918 harvest, and then under conditions which must be elaborated. There is therefore no determined price for the 1917 harvest.
The result of this situation is that the normal price-making machinery is broken down, unless some efficient Government action is brought into play. Either:
(A) The American producer may face a slump in wheat, possibly below his production cost;
(B) The export price of wheat which ultimately determines the real price is at the will of a single agency; or
(C) Some one must buy the surplus wheat at any given moment, and if the surplus passes into speculative hands, it will be held for higher prices later in the year.

Mr. President, let us examine that a minute. Mr. Hoover comes before the American farmer and gives as one of his reasons for seizing the grain markets the fact that Congress failed to fix a legislative price for this year's wheat crop.

It will be remembered that when the bill left the Senate it contained a guaranty of $2 per bushel for the 1917 wheat crop. That provision was changed to a guaranty for the 1918 crop; the guaranty for the present crop being withdrawn.

I charge that Mr. Hoover's satellites and influences were thrown in favor of depriving the farmer of his legislative guaranty for the crop of 1917. Yet we are presented with the spectacle of Hoover now coming forward offering as a reason why he may seize the American market the fact that the farmer is deprived of any legislative price guaranty for this year's wheat crop.

I stated when the bill was under discussion that the price of the farmer's wheat for the present year would be absolutely subject to Mr. Hoover's will. The assertion was regarded as almost unbelievable and scarcely worth serious consideration.

Senators insisted that the farmer's prices for this year were absolutely secure. That the condition of the market was a sufficient guarantee of prices. They insisted that the bill gave Mr. Hoover no power to take away from the farmer the advantage of high prices for the present year. They further insisted that if Mr. Hoover did possess the power he would not exercise it. And yet, sir, Hoover's decree plainly asserts that he has the power to fix the price of every bushel of wheat in the United States and that he proposes to fix the price.

He says:

That in substitution for a broken-down market machinery the food administration proposes to open agencies and to take over the whole harvest. * * * It will resell the wheat for export in such quantities as we can afford to part with in protection of our own people, on the one hand, and to sell, on the other, to the millers for domestic consumption. * * * The food administrator, under these arrangements, would have a large influence in affecting the price of wheat.

He neglects to say that it was his action and his policies that broke down the market machinery. He does say that "he proposes to take the entire wheat crop." He does say "that the organization of a single purchasing agency for the allies has denied the farmer any European market except the one which is controlled." He does say "that the conditions have been made which completely controls the farmer's market," and, of course, control of the market controls the price.

But Mr. Hoover goes further and expressly declares the purpose to fix the price. He says:

With a view to determining a fair price the President has approved the appointment of a commission to be selected from representatives of the producing sections and consuming element in the community—

And so forth. And then to make it doubly clear that the farmer is completely at his mercy he states:

It should thus be clear that it will not be to the advantage of any producer to hold back his grain in anticipation of a further advance, for he will do so only at his own cost of storage and interest.

It is too plain for argument or dispute that this bill has to a large extent placed the destiny and fortunes of 45,000,000 people engaged in agriculture in the United States in the hands of one man. When the Congress gave that power it committed a crime against liberty.

What do you gentlemen who said Mr. Hoover would never exercise these powers have to say in the face of this decree? The bill was passed by the argument that its extensive powers were asked merely for their moral effect, but that they were never, in fact, to be exercised. Mr. Hoover in substance said that in his testimony when he was before the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. Hoover states:

This country need never approach a food dictatorship. Our conception of the problem in the United States is that we should assemble a voluntary effort of the people * * *. That we should in effect undertake with their cooperation the regulation of the distributing machinery of the country in such a way that we may restore its functions to as nearly as may be a prewar basis and thus eliminate, so far as may be, the evils and failures which have sprung up, and at the same time we propose to mobilize the spirit of self-denial and self-sacrifice in this country in order that we may reduce our national waste and our national expenditure.
If democracy is worth anything, we can do these things by cooperation, by stimulation, by self-sacrifice, by the patriotic mobilization of the brains of this country. If it can not be done in this manner, it is better that we accept German domination and confess the failure of our political ideals, acquiesce in the superiority of the German conception, and send for the Germans to instruct us in its use. At the same time, while we may rest with assurance upon the volunteer support which we shall receive and which we are receiving from hundreds of trades throughout the country, there is no population so perfect, so filled with idealism, that there is not some residue who will refuse to cooperate and thereby nullify every endeavor of the majority. Therefore it is necessary to have considerable powers for the regulation of trade in order that we may give support to those patriotic men who are willing to bend their energies to the national necessity and force the minority to follow their leadership.

See hearings, part 1, page 12.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say in this connection when the bill was under consideration in the committee I asked one Senator if he thought we ought to confer such extraordinary powers as the bill conveyed on any one man. The Senator answered that no sane man would ever undertake to exercise such powers. I then inquired if he thought that we as sane men, charged with some sort of responsibility ought to confer powers upon anybody that no one but an insane man would undertake to exercise. I thought that might illuminate that point to some extent. Even his confidence does not seem to be justified.

Mr. REED. But Mr. Hoover also stated, when he was interrogated with reference to the great powers that were being asked, he expected to accomplish nearly everything by moral suasion and by agreement, and that he only desired these powers to bring in the recalcitrants and the unreasonable men. I have already quoted his language to that effect.

Mr. President, what are Mr. Hoover's remedies?

First, he proposes to compel every elevator and mill of more than 100 barrels daily capacity to take out a license conditioned (a) "That only customary charges will be made." That will give us no relief. We have never complained that the charges of the mill or elevator were extraordinary at this time. The customary charges which have always obtained still exist and are not extortionate.

But Mr. Hoover adds that "no wheat shall be stored for more than 30 days without the approval of the Food Commissioner." That provision, Mr. President, to state it mildly, is destructive and evinces Mr. Hoover's ignorance of the wheat business in America which is truly appalling. How is the wheat of this country cared for? A very large percentage of it is carried to the elevators by farmers for the express purpose of having it stored and kept until suitable market conditions exist. Other large quantities are purchased by millers for use in the ordinary course of their business and stored in the elevators. If no man is permitted to keep wheat in the elevators for a longer period of time than 30 days, vast quantities of it must be dumped on the market as soon as harvested. Neither the elevators nor the railroads nor the mills can handle the grain of the country if it is thus thrust upon the market. Hence the very purpose of storing; hence the very utility of elevators. But this man, who has lived in England all his grown-up life, who, I assert again and yet again, is utterly unacquainted with the magnitude of the American Nation or of the task he has assumed, proposes to say that no man shall keep his grain in an elevator more than 30 days without his gracious permission.

The next proposition Mr. Hoover makes is "that the grain exchanges have been commanded to suspend all dealings and quotations in future wheat." There are two kinds of dealings in futures, as has been explained a hundred times.

A purchase of wheat for future delivery may be a gambling operation, but it is ordinarily a perfectly legitimate and useful transaction. Let me outline a series of common business deals.

A baker may desire to contract his flour for, let us say, 90 days in advance. This is necessary in order that he may make his ordinary business plans. Accordingly he asks the wholesale flour dealer to quote him prices. The wholesaler can not quote prices until he knows what the miller will charge him for flour. Accordingly he asks the miller to quote prices, but the miller can not safely quote prices 90 days ahead unless he knows what his wheat will cost him. He thereupon asks a man engaged in the business of buying grain to quote him prices for delivery in 30, 60, and 90 days. The grain buyer then contracts with farmers or perhaps farm elevators or small independent dealers to furnish him grain to fill his orders.

Now, if the grain dealer is denied the privilege of transacting business in this usual way he can give no assurance to the miller, neither can the miller contract with the wholesale dealer or the wholesale dealer contract with the baker. All this chain of business is broken up. At the same time the farmer's market is destroyed. You can not work this destruction of ordinary business methods without its evil results fall also in part upon the consumer.

Mr. President, Mr. Hoover proposes to license every mill in the country. That great business so essential to the farmer is to come under the control of Mr. Hoover. That business which has been conducted by experts is to be taken from its owners and turned over to Hoover's control and dictation.

When this bill passed we were told on every hand that the power would never be exercised unless the millers of the country did something to rob the people of a fair market, did something to oppress the people, did something that was wicked and wrong. Accordingly we found in the bill as it originally came to us from the House a provision for taking over the management and control of business when the fact was established that evil practices were being indulged in.

Now, the mills are taken over at once, or their control taken over, under the licensing provision, and they are also to be deprived of the privilege of going into the markets and buying grain in the usual way.

The extent of Mr. Hoover's ambition is measured by this clause in his statement. After he has declared that he intends to take over or control by license all elevators of the capacity of more than 100 barrels per day he adds:

> While farmers' cooperative elevators are excepted by the food bill, this, however, only applies to mutual concerns and not to stock companies, and in any event under the advantages of joining the plan none is likely to stand out.

Mr. President, when we passed the bill we thought we had excepted the farmers' elevators. We thought we had arranged a plan by which those elevators that are really the property of farmers in which they put their wheat aside and hold it through winter months and conserve it and care for until the time shall come when they desire to market it—we thought we had excepted them from Mr. Hoover. But you will observe that Mr. Hoover proposes to lay his hands upon every one of them which happens to be organized in the form of a corporation, although the stock is held by the farmers. Even as to these he utters the implied threat that conditions will be created that will bring all of them into line. Of course, those conditions can be created, for if Mr. Hoover can license every mill in the country and can control the foreign market he can easily choke the farmers' elevators into submission, because he will control the only market its owners have for their wheat. The plain truth must be faced that Mr. Hoover is absolute and sole dictator over the farmers, so far as his wheat is concerned.

That is not all, Mr. President. Mr. Hoover serves notice that he has the consumer in his grasp. He serves notice that the consumer will get but little benefit. Let me read you what he says. Now, mark you, he tells us "he is going to stabilize prices." That is the purpose he claims for his action. Then he states this, and I read his exact words. It is paragraph (d) of section 5 of the decree:

> (d) With stabilized prices, extra hazards are introduced into all distribution links, which must be paid for by the consumer.

He adds:

> It must be evident that the United States Government can more justly deal with the situation than any of the agencies mentioned.

The very method of stabilizing prices, according to Mr. Hoover, is to take possession of the market, to take possession of the mill, to take possession of the means of distribution. Now, Mr. Hoover tells us that this method of stabilizing prices, which consist in taking possession of the instrumentalities that move the wheat from the producer to the consumer, is bound to increase the cost. We shall all know that before the bill has been in operation many days we shall find that it will act injuriously for both producer and consumer.

Mr. Hoover makes the statement that—

> In substitution of the broken-down marketing machinery the food administration proposes to open agencies for the purchase of all wheat at the principal terminals, carrying on its transactions with the usual dealers and is prepared to take the whole harvest if necessary.

Who broke down this market, pray? Did we not have a market until Mr. Hoover came and interfered? Did that market not consist of an export market? Did it not further consist of a great domestic market? Who has broken up that market except Mr. Hoover?

But Mr. Hoover was prepared to seize this market in advance; he intended in advance to break up and destroy this market, for he had his organization already effected, his men already picked, his agents already planted for the purpose of taking possession of the primary wheat markets of the United States. In face of that he tells the country that he is doing these things because "the market has been broken up and destroyed."

Mr. President, I have called your attention to the fact that the allies have but one purchasing agent, and as no one can sell abroad except through the agency thus established, the foreign market is thus so monopolized that the American farmer can no longer have the benefit of it; second, Mr. Hoover states plainly that he intends to take possession of the American market and to fix the price for wheat. A board is already being organized to fix the price of every bushel of wheat raised by all the farmers of the United States. There is, therefore, left to the farmer no market whatsoever for his wheat. But what is the condition of the consumer? The American consumer is also at Mr. Hoover's mercy. The only wheat he can get he must get from Mr. Hoover and upon Mr. Hoover's terms. That means that Mr. Hoover will send out of this country, as he says in his statement he intends to do, such proportion of the wheat as he wants to send abroad. He states—and I quote his words—that the Government—> will resell wheat for export in such quantities as we can afford to part with in protection of our own people on one hand and to sell on the other to the millers for domestic consumption.

Let us just read that now as it will be executed, "Mr. Hoover will resell wheat for export in such quantities as he thinks he desires and will sell to millers for domestic consumption in such quantities as he desires to sell." That means the wheat of America, which is raised in a territory 3,000 miles long and 1,500 miles wide, is by this foolish and arbitrary and undemocratic legislation placed in the hands of one man.

That means 104,000,000 people can only have as much wheat to eat as Mr. Hoover sees fit to give them. That means Mr. Hoover can send out of this country so much of the wheat that there will not be enough left to feed the American people. That means Mr. Hoover can compel the American people to eat substitutes for wheat if he sees fit so to do; that means he can compel the American consumer to put upon his table a limited amount of wheat bread; that means that the licensed miller can be compelled, if Mr. Hoover so commands, to make nothing but adulterated flour.

The only reason Mr. Hoover had for seeking this great power was that he might employ it. Now that he has received it, he immediately takes steps to control all American grain.

Nor is that all. Whoever controls American grain thereby indirectly controls many other farm products. If you will examine the terms of this bill, you will find that we have practically placed the control of everything within the hands of this man.

I now make a statement that I believe to be true, and upon which I am willing to hazard whatever reputation I have for sound judgment, that a food dictator who lived in England all of his grown-up life, whose house and whose home are in England, whose business affiliations are in England, whose business associates are Englishmen will employ his powers in the interest of England. I ask the Members of the Senate, many of whom I find have not even read this decree, to read it. Read it because it is the decree of your master; the master you have placed over your people. Read it and observe how your master employs his almost omnipotent power.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. REED. Had the Senator from Pennsylvania announced that he was going to speak? If he did so, it escaped me, and if I had known it I should not have trespassed upon the Senator's time.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Finance understood that I was to speak, but the Senator from Missouri has been so unusually brief that I do not complain.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, after the comprehensive explanation of the chairman of the Finance Committee concerning the details of the revenue bill, I feel that it is not necessary for me at this time to go into any lengthy presentation of the subject. I know that it is desired by everyone to expedite the passage of this bill, and while the fullest discussion is desirable for the information of the Senate and of the people, yet it is agreed that unnecessary discussion should be avoided. For one reason or another the bill comes up for consideration several weeks later than had been originally contemplated, and its prompt passage is, therefore, all the more urgently required.

Moreover, Mr. President, I think that the members of the committee can best conserve their forces to discuss the measure in detail as the various titles and paragraphs of the bill come up for discussion.

I desire, however, to state briefly some of my views as a member of the minority party. As a matter of fact, I cordially concur in the statement of the chairman of the committee that partisanship was absent from the deliberations of the committee. We all agreed that it was necessary to raise money for the war to the full extent of the requirements of the estimates. The committee is composed of Senators from widely separated sections of the country and with differing environments and affiliations, but I take pleasure here in testifying to the fact that the discussions were temperate and illuminating and had the single purpose in view. The committee had the bill under consideration for over two months, holding continuous daily sessions, and during that period the members were in receipt of several thousand letters from all over the country expressing the views, suggestions, and objections of taxpayers. The committee had the advantage of the information derived from open hearings, in which the different business interests were represented by the ablest men in the Nation, and in addition to these open hearings some informal hearings were held after the regular hearings had been closed. As a further source of information, the members of the committee were every day visited by a very large number of people from all over the country, who personally and to the fullest extent expressed their views.

I want to express here my appreciation of the patriotism, without a single exception and without regard to party politics, of those who appeared before the committee or called individually on the members of the committee. Everyone was entirely willing to bear his share, to the fullest extent, of the expenses of the war. There was no dissenting voice in this respect. The only question presented was that of distributing the taxes so that they would bear equitably upon the different classes of taxpayers. The same spirit that prompted the taxpayers also inspired the committee. The committee patiently considered every criticism and every suggestion with the single view of rendering the framework of the tax bill logical, equitable, and at the same time effective in furnishing the means of raising the necessary revenue. No one asked any favors, and none were granted, and I am particularly glad to be able to say that in addition to the absence of partisanship any spirit of sectionalism was entirely absent, a situation which indicated a harmonious, patriotic purpose to provide for all the financial requirements of the war.

It is needless for me to say, Mr. President, that since the advent of the present administration I have voted against the several revenue bills enacted into law by the party in power. I refer to the bills passed in 1913, 1914, 1916, and 1917, first revising the tariff and then later inaugurating the radical departure in the fiscal policy of the United States of largely abandoning the customhouse as the source of revenue and resorting to direct taxation to meet the requirements of the Treasury.

I shall not at this time more than refer to my views concerning the policy of direct taxation in time of peace in the United States, because I fully went into this subject last summer in several speeches which I made on the bill to increase the revenue and for other purposes. I am one of those who believe that in time of peace it was evidently the intention of the framers of our Government—and that intention is distinctly set forth in the several paragraphs of the Constitution—that the revenues of the Government necessary to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States should be provided by duties, excises, and imposts. Moreover, the larger part of the revenues of the Government has actually been collected from such imposts and duties throughout the history of our country, together with an excise tax upon certain articles of luxury and consumption; and the great and rapidly growing sovereign States of the Union have been left largely undisturbed in the power of levying direct taxes for their expanding needs. Income taxes and direct taxes, in my opinion, Mr. President, should only be invoked when the customs duties are inadequate. The revenue bill of last summer contained a striking instance of the ill-advised and unfair encroachment of the Federal Government in levying direct taxes upon an object upon which it has been the established practice of many of the States of the Union to rely for a considerable part of their revenues. Nearly all the States have laws imposing direct inheritance or other taxes both upon direct and collateral heirs. The Federal Government came in and attempted to collect its share of tribute by a Federal tax upon inheritance. Since the enactment of the bill of last summer into law, California and many States in the East have, through legislative resolution or executive expression, protested against this tax; and it is a commendable feature of the present bill as it is reported from the Finance Committee that the committee has stricken from the bill a further proposed tax upon inheritances as being unfair to the States.

I do not intend at this time—because the occasion would not be proper—to go into an argument in favor of a protective tariff. In my opinion the time will come, sooner or later with the close of the war, when a protective tariff will be more than ever necessary to the people of the United States. With the close of the military war the international industrial contest will be resumed. Attention was called by the Senator from Missouri, myself, and other Senators in the debate last August to the meeting of the council of the Chamber of Commerce of London, held on January 13, 1916, when a number of important recommendations were adopted on the subject of trade during and after the war. They were in the main for preferential reciprocal trading relations between all parts of the British Empire, for reciprocal trading relations between the British Empire and the allied countries, for the favorable treatment of neutral countries, for regulating, by tariffs and otherwise, trade relations with all enemy countries so as to render impossible a return to prewar conditions, and for stimulating the development of home manufactures and the consequent increased employment of native labor.

Attention was called in these proceedings to what is termed the "new opportunity." It was declared that the war now waged against the alliance, by stopping the great imports of German and Austrian manufactures, affords a unique opportunity for recuperating lost trade and industry. But it was urged that immediate action was imperative, so that English manufactures might be in a position to supply the demand that must arise as soon as the war is ended. It will be impossible, however, it was said, for the English manufacturers to lay down the plant necessary to regain lost ground unless they have some guaranty that their struggling industries will not be crushed by unlimited foreign imports. The nation must, therefore, it was further declared, adopt a distinct and decided policy, which should embrace the following points—I quote them, and many of them almost read as if they were taken from the speech of some American protectionist, except that they go much further:

1. To secure employment and good wages for our workers.

2. To draw our revenue from foreign nations instead of taxing our own subjects.

3. To open an enormous market in our colonies and dependencies that will render us independent of foreign trade and furnish us with supplies at moderate prices.

4. To levy the following duties:

From German and Austrian and other hostile nations, heavy duties on all goods.

From favored nations, moderate duties on manufactured goods and light duties on raw materials that can not be produced in our country, such as cotton, jute, tea, coffee, cocoa, etc.

From our colonies and dependencies, light duties on manufactured goods and admission duty free of raw materials that can not be produced at home.

5. To enter into agreements with our colonies and dependencies for reciprocity and preferential treatment on the abovementioned principles.

It was urged, Mr. President, by the same chamber of commerce that immediate action was imperative; that it would be the height of folly to postpone preparation until the war is over; that even after the adoption of tariff reforms, as above described, it would be very difficult to stem the inrush of German and other foreign goods at the close of the war.

Hardly more than a year ago, while the debate on the revenue bill of last summer was progressing in this body, we were informed of the ecomonic conference in Paris, to which frequent attention was called in this Chamber last year, in which the allied Governments of England, France, Italy, and Russia were represented by members of their respective cabinets. The conference agreed upon sweeping measures of tariff restriction to be put in force during and after the war. According to the cable dispatches during the war citizens of the allied nations are forbidden to engage in any commerce with enemy subjects. All merchandising from enemy countries is likewise forbidden. Commercial houses having enemy connections are sequestered. During the reconstruction period the allies declared their purpose to carry on joint action in restoring their industries, agriculture, and merchant fleets. It was even urged that there should be adopted subventions and advances to encourage enterprises and research, scientific and technical. Besides subventions and advances to certain industries, the allies were to consider tariff changes and prohibitions, temporary or permanent. These recommendations go very far beyond anything advocated by any American statesman, even of the protectionist school.

I am not informed as to whether the recommendations of the Paris conference have been followed up to any extent since the conference occurred. It is sufficient to call attention to the fact that they have been proposed, and, while I do not mean in any way to suggest that there is any intimation of hostile intent toward the United States in these proposals, I do say that after the war I hope there will be guaranties of a long peace, and that then the civilized nations of the world can enter into the honorable rivalries of trade and commerce and the development of the arts and sciences; and each nation will fairly be entitled to adopt such trade and tariff regulations as may best suit the conditions and the standards of its people; and, in my opinion, it will be inevitable that the United States above all other nations will require a protective tariff to maintain its industrial prosperity and the high standards of its people.

But I only refer to this condition in passing, in response to many communications received by me, and doubtless by others of the minority party on the committee, urging that as much of the revenue required by the war as possible may be raised from a protective tariff tax.

After careful consideration, Mr. President, the committee quite generally came to the conclusion, regardless of whether the members of the committee happened to favor high or low tariff duties, that it would be impossible to impose tariff duties at this time, with the whole world upset, without enormously disturbing business. The industry and the commerce of the world are out of their normal currents. Among the belligerent nations in Europe a long list of articles, ordinarily prominent in international trade, have been, in numerous proclamations issued by the Governments of the several countries, declared to be contraband of war. Governments have taken control, by a series of decrees and orders, of practically all the articles in the lists of conditional contraband, so that they are now available for Government use. Embargoes have been established, licenses to export have been authorized, efforts are being made to control prices, setting aside the laws of supply and demand; the railroads of foreign countries have been completely nationalized for all purposes and are in charge of the Government; and here the tendency is rapidly growing in the same direction. While the statistics show that there is considerable importation of foreign goods and merchandise into the United States, yet the fact remains that the war, with the accompanying depredations of the submarine, has practically taken the foreign trade of the United States out of all normal conditions and largely acts as a protective barrier from the invasion of cheaper commodities, if there are now any such, from abroad. The conditions of labor for the time being have also been revolutionized all over the world. The young and the vigorous men are on the firing line, and women have taken the place of men in industrial establishments. Many of these establishments abroad have been taken over by the Government with guaranties of a certain profit to the owners. Under these circumstances it would seem evident to anyone that the data are not at hand to furnish any information concerning a stable, consistent, and logical tariff system.

Again, the duties as imposed in the House bill consisted of a general ad valorem increase of 10 per cent on all imports. A very great number of articles which always had been on the free list under a protection as well as a free trade régime were put upon the dutiable list with an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent. The raw materials which had always been on the free list carrying this ad valorem duty would have ramified in scores of directions to embarrass production at a time when all productive activities are surrounded by abnormal and changing conditions. And it was generally conceded that the ad valorem rates would lead to the usual difficulties of undervaluation and of price ascertainment, and that even if it should have been deemed wise to impose tariff duties they should be specific.

Of course, in the case of many of these tariff duties, such as the duty on wool, the imposition of a duty would have opened up the whole question of the wool schedule, one of the most complicated and difficult in the whole tariff framework, and would have prolonged the hearings, the consideration, and the discussion of this revenue measure, so urgently needed, for an indefinite length of time. What few articles remained, after those had been eliminated upon which an imposition of a duty at this time seemed unwise, were so few in number and so insignificant in the revenue which would accrue, that it did not seem worth while to mar the logical system of the bill by singling them out and opening up the tariff question. In this view of the committee I cheerfully concurred, and I believe the manufacturers of the United States concur. Not that the protective policy will not be a stronger issue than ever before when the time arrives, but because it is evident that it is impossible in the short time allowed for the consideration of this bill, and with the upset condition of the world, to take up this phase of the question now.

Nevertheless, sooner or later—and perhaps the war may be over sooner than expected—we will be confronted with the question, and it should be the first duty of the administration, and especially of the tariff board, to consider the situation carefully and investigate, so far as the ascertainment of any data is possible just now, with a view of having made some progress toward industrial preparedness after the maintenance of military preparedness required by a state of war has passed away.

I opposed the measures enacted since 1913 because they constituted a distinct effort in favor of which an agitation had been going on over the country for a considerable period to abandon as far as possible the collection of revenue at the customhouse and to impose direct taxes on the people. It is not pertinent or necessary to discuss these measures now, except to say that in my opinion they frequently exhibited a tendency toward sectionalism and class opposition; but now the situation is different. We are at war. Revenues must be provided; the American Government has never hesitated to raise revenue by direct taxes and loans when required during a war, and the people will pay them cheerfully so long as they are uniform, equitable, and logical.

There is another feature about this bill which distinguishes it entirely from ordinary fiscal legislation. The bill is temporary in its operation—in fact, it will expire after the war—and the taxpayer must not overlook this fact when he awakes with surprise to the burden of his taxes. When the war is over the whole tax system of the country will, of course, be revised. The several emergency laws will have to be repealed and the good that is in all of them retained, with such additions as experience has demonstrated are required. When that time comes my hope is that a fiscal system will be enacted providing for the requirements of the Government by duties on imports based on adequate protective lines, the usual revenue from excise taxes, and such moderate direct taxes as the Government may require to carry on the many heavy burdens which will be ours for a considerable period after peace is declared.

I have referred to the fidelity with which the members of the committee attended to their task, and the extent of the work ought not to be underrated. This is the largest tax bill in the history of our Government, and American public men up until recently have had no familiarity with and little knowledge of the principles on which direct taxes should be based. As the chairman of the committee stated in his opening remarks, the prewar expenses of our Government, or down to the war during all our history, which now seem insignificant compared to the colossal amounts we have been dealing with in the last few months in the way of expenditures, no matter which party was in power or what economic policy prevailed, largely were provided for through customs duties and excise taxes; and even the direct tax bills to which I have referred, passed since 1913, had in view the raising of such a comparatively small amount of revenue that the task was trifling compared with the present one. Inequalities or inequities, oversights, and inconsistencies existing in the act of 1916 and the previous laws could be borne and tolerated by the business community, because the tax was slight compared to those proposed to be imposed; but such inequalities and inequities became glaring and unendurable with this vast increase in the tax burden. Therefore many of the principles and provisions of existing laws had to be carefully revised and corrected. I refer, by way of illustration, to the complaints of double taxation in connection with the holding companies and their subsidiaries. This double taxation was tolerated, perhaps, under previous laws, but under the heavy taxes now contemplated the imposition of this double taxation would have imposed crushing burdens upon business and caused wholesale reorganization and reconstruction of corporations, in order to avoid the tax or render it more endurable. Hence, the Finance Committee, very properly in my mind, struck this feature from the bill and made up whatever loss of revenue might have occurred by reason of the elimination of this double taxation by increases and additions in other directions.

There were, of course, few, if any, precedents in American history to guide the Ways and Means Committee or the Finance Committee in framing this great measure. Nor was it always possible to get the fullest information as to the experience of other nations; and after all, Mr. President, there is no more deceptive or fallacious comparison than that made between a country like the United States, covering a continental domain with every climatic and racial variety and with such extraordinary rapidity of growth and development, with the older nations of Europe, with smaller populations, much less productive capacity, and industrial conditions long established and stable. Moreover, the conditions prevailing in these European nations at the outbreak of the war and during its continuance are entirely different from those which have confronted us or are likely to confront us. Three years ago almost everybody thought that the war would be over in a short time. It has continued for now over three years. The greater part of the vigorous manhood of these countries is on the firing line; many of their industries have been abandoned, and they have come over here to get munitions and equipment of war. In this country, of course, an entirely different condition exists in the financial and industrial world and in the condition of labor. And I can not find, after as careful an investigation as I have been able to make, from a study of history and the experience of nations in the present war, that there is much to be learned by precedent or comparison, or that there is any sound economic theory which will give any suggestion or information as to what fixed percentage should be agreed on as to the relation between the amount to be raised by taxes and the amount to be raised by loan. This relation must be governed by the particular conditions in each country, by the length of the war or the contemplated length of the war, and by the financial status of the country. It is estimated that the bill as passed by the House will raise $1,867,000,000, and as amended by the Senate committee $2,009,670,000. The bill as reported to the Senate will raise an amount slightly in excess of the estimate furnished to the committee by the Treasury Department on July 2, 1917. The bill as passed by the House, together with the existing law, will raise by taxation 56 per cent of the estimated expenditures already appropriated for, exclusive of postal revenue and the sinking fund requirements. As amended by the Senate committee, such per cent will be increased to 58 per cent of the total expenditures raised by taxation for this year.

Some had a strong opinion in the beginning of the consideration of the bill that if $1,000,000,000 was raised for this year the rest could easily and properly be left to a loan. Gradually, however, the opinion developed that perhaps $1,500,000,000 ought to be raised by direct taxes. Further investigation, however, brought about the general conclusion that Congress ought to provide for the full estimates furnished by the Treasury Department to the committee on July 7, 1917, which, after allowing for the estimated receipts and the loan, showed additional revenue necessary to be raised by taxation or a further bond issue of $1,943,458,000. Hence the amendments to the bill adopted by the committee, which raises the amount estimated to be collected under the bill somewhat in excess of the estimated requirements. The committee had in mind the large amount to be raised and the enormous war profits amounting to nearly $3,000,000,000, shown by the income tax returns of corporations for 1916, which amount will undoubtedly be increased for the year 1917, due in the main to war and war conditions; and the conclusion was reached that $562,000,000 was not an unreasonable additional amount to ask from the industries whose earnings have been so greatly augmented by the conditions which made necessary the call for this additional revenue.

The war-profits tax, Mr. President, is preeminently a logical and just one at the present time, and here I want to say that it is not claimed for the war-revenue measure that it embodies the logical principles of taxation that ought to apply in normal times of peace. It is distinctly an emergency war measure, of temporary duration—a month, six months, or a year—based on an abnormal and extraordinary condition in the industrial and financial world, and taxes and scales of taxes higher than would be justified in times of peace are logical and proper under such war conditions, when entirely different principles would have to be applied in a revised tax system to meet peace conditions. Then, it must be borne in mind by the taxpayer that these conditions are temporary and the principles applied are justified by the temporary and abnormal conditions. The tax on personal incomes and on war profits, swollen by the war conditions, furnish primarily the justifiable, legitimate, and logical taxes to defray the expenses of the war. It is estimated that about two-thirds of the additional revenue and about one-half of the total revenue from taxation for the fiscal year 1918 will come from the income and the war-profits taxes. With 58 per cent of the estimated expenditures defrayed by direct taxation, I am of the opinion that it would be unwise to increase these direct taxes under any of the titles in the bill. I am willing to concede, for the sake of argument, that the income tax and the war-profits tax are perhaps too high. I know that it will lead to considerable embarrassment among manufacturing concerns which have undergone enormous expansion since the prewar period to meet war requirements on borrowed capital or the application of all the surplus and capital to the development of the business. Doubtless the concerns will have difficulty in getting the money for the tax where their profits have been large, and it is a question, should the war suddenly terminate, as to how some of them will come out. But, on the other hand, we have staring us in the face the enormous profits and the great prices charged, particularly to the Government, and the graduated taxes charged on war profits will go a long way toward controlling extortionate profits. I believe that, while these taxes are heavy and perhaps should be lower, they can be borne, particularly in view of the fact that they are temporary, and I am confident that any reasonable student of the economic situation ought to feel satisfied that the committee has gone as far as it safely can go in the imposition of direct taxation just now. To go further would begin to cripple the industrial development which constitutes our chief strength and our chief contribution to the war.

It was testified before the Finance Committee, and I think the illustration was a most impressive one, that even as it is the War Department has been compelled to advance the money to enlarge some half dozen quite large and more or less prominent iron and steel concerns in different parts of the country engaged in making munitions, because these establishments did not have the capital and could not borrow it to make these additions. It is true the Government will own these additional buildings after the war, with their machinery, but in almost every case they will be of no use to the Government except as junk, and in some cases of not any great use to the particular concerns to which they are adjacent, because it is clear that their productive activities will be curtailed with the consummation of peace. I only cite this particular case, which I think, Mr. President, shows that it is distinctly to the interest of the Government to keep these industrial concerns in a financial condition so that they can expand on their own capital or be in a position to borrow it to meet the requirements of the United States and of the allies as speedily as possible. It is evident from the illustration that I have given that it is not to the interest of the Government to impose taxes upon them so heavy that they will not be able to expand themselves, and the Government will have to go into the losing investment of furnishing the money for them. In the long run it will be cheaper for the Government to let private capital take the risks and accomplish the results rather than by crippling them to have to do it with Government money, which will be almost entirely a loss after the requirements of the war have ceased.

The question of taxation—and this phase of the situation impresses me very greatly, Mr. President—is further complicated by the apparent failure of those purchasing for the Government to come to any decision as to prices. It is evidently important at this time to keep every productive establishment in the country in the fullest operation. If prices are reduced to below a certain point it is inevitable, and it hardly requires the statement, that the larger and wealthier concerns will be able, perhaps, to go on, because they produce at a less cost and a greater profit, while smaller and less favored establishments which have been brought into productive operation by the requirements of the war will be closed up as soon as the price curve strikes the limit at which they can produce at a profit. Hence, production will be curtailed and monopoly will be fostered by indiscreet price tampering.

The revenue from this bill has had introduced into it an element of uncertainty by reason of the price controversy. It seems to me that speed and prompt delivery is the essence of the emergency. One hundred million dollars are being spent, it is said, each day by the allies, or $1,000,000,000 every 10 days, and it is estimated that 10,000 men are being killed each day on the side of the allies. In this tremendous crisis speedy delivery constitutes the most imperatively essential element. Every 10 days occurs this enormous expenditure of men and money, which no saving on prices will ever balance on the other side of the ledger. It has been suggested by many sagacious men constituting the highest types of our business community and with disinterested patriotism, that the tax on war profits could be very well so graduated as to enforce a penalty upon those who insist upon charging excessive prices to the Government for their material during this war period, and in this way relieve the situation so that price adjustment will not be so necessary and business will be permitted to take its natural course. Thus prices will be largely controlled by the competitive market and will settle down to the minimum prices at which maximum production can be reached.

If we are going to fight this war with a success it will be necessary to have maximum production from every industry in the country. The falling off of labor due to conscription enlistment will be felt in the near future, and the more inducement to labor will be required to maintain our present status as manufacturers. If I had my way, Mr. President—and I consider the subject of very great importance—I would urge an amendment to this bill that purchases should be handled by a committee of three, whose duty it will be to determine prices, decide upon priority, as well as to advise the various purchasing agents now employed by the Government so as to protect them against criticism. The delay in settling the steel question, the delay in settling the food problem, the delay in settling the lumber question, the shoe business, the coal business, and other lines of production, is delaying the determined and relentless prosecution of the war in a way that is appalling when we come to realize it.

But I shall not pursue this subject further. Already legislation has been passed attempting to solve the problem, but not, in my opinion, meeting it on sound economic lines. The purpose of those in authority seems to proceed upon a different principle, and while this whole matter will doubtless come up for discussion later on, I merely refer to it now because it touches at the fundamentals of a logical war-tax system.

There are numerous amendments made by the committee which, in my opinion, greatly improve the bill as it came to the Senate from the House. The House bill provided for an imposition of an additional tax of 33⅓ per cent on incomes for the calendar year 1916. The committee recommends that this section 5 be stricken out. This tax seemed to the committee economically unsound, because the incomes of the past calendar year have paid their taxes and the balance has either been spent upon subsistence and the expense of living, or it has been saved and added to capital. To quote from the report of the committee:

> To tax this tax-paid income again is not only double taxation of a peculiarly obnoxious kind, but would possibly compel the taxpayer to impair his capital by paying this second tax and thus diminish the Government's source of taxation.

It was estimated in the House that $108,000,000 would be raised from this section. While eliminating the provisions from the bill, the Senate committee has, of course, made up this amount in other ways.

I am afraid that the tax on beverages is too high, because in many cases it will be above the collection point and will invite violation of the internal-revenue laws. However, it is generally conceded that these articles of consumption can very well afford to bear a heavy tax, and the committee has therefore raised the rates over those which obtained in the House bill. I shall only refer in passing to the taxes on facilities furnished by public utilities, and the war-excise taxes, the war tax on admissions and dues, and the war-stamp taxes. These taxes will bring in considerable revenue, and they are justified on the theory that these war taxes ought to be widely distributed and not bear on any particular class or element, personal or corporate. The war taxes on coffee and tea and sugar were carried in the House bill as a 10 per centum ad valorem duty. In eliminating the tariff feature from the bill the committee has proposed excise taxes on these four articles which are so moderate that they can not possibly be felt by the consumer and particularly in the case of tea and coffee will not in the long run affect the price to any appreciable extent.

Perhaps the two features of the revenue bill which gave the committee most trouble and led to the most widespread criticism were the various suggestions as to base lines for the computation of the war-profits tax and the proposed tax on undistributed surplus.

The House bill followed the present law, which provides a flat rate of 8 per cent upon the profits of corporations and copartnerships in excess of the sum of 8 per cent of their capital actually invested, plus $5,000, and imposes an additional tax of 8 per cent upon such profits. The excess-profits tax in the old law never had any logical foundation. The term "excess profits" has no particular meaning that I have ever been able to discover. What are excess profits and when does a profit become excessive, if that is the implication of the term based upon a minimum percentage? Certainly, we have not reached a condition tending toward socialism when we shall put a limit upon what a man or a corporation can earn legitimately and legally.

I have never been able to discover on what basis any definition of excess profits could be framed. I have never learned of any standard in the United States which defines when profits become excessive, nor can a definition, in my opinion, be framed that would be logical and responsive to business development. At least we would have to take a long average of years to arrive at some definition of excess profits, because the extraordinary profits of one year might be followed by a number of lean years and eventual bankruptcy. I am rather inclined to think that the term originated as the result of a long agitation, which argued that the rich were escaping their due share of taxation and that a protective tariff was oppressing the poor; and hence when the radical departure was made in the last few years in which customs duties were largely abandoned purposely and a deliberate attempt was made to levy direct taxes on what was called a "class," the term "excess profits" was invented to designate and justify the proceeding. A tax on incomes and a tax on profits is, of course, logical and justifiable when required, but a tax on excess profits is meaningless, unequal, and inequitable. Moreover, the excess-profits tax involves us in questions concerning what is "capital." In the vast number of corporations of every kind and variety in the United States it is almost impossible to establish a standard of the amount of capital invested. It may be that in the case of many of the railroads which for a number of years have had their accounts kept under rules laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the securities of which are fully ascertained and determinable, the question of capital invested is capable generally of computation. But even in the case of railroads the variation in the relation between the amount of bond issue and the amount of stock securities is widely varying. For instance, the New York Central Railroad and the Pennsylvania Railroad have about the same mileage and the same aggregate investment; yet in the case of the New York Central the bond issue is two-thirds and the stock issue one-third of the total amount, while the reverse is the case with the Pennsylvania Railroad.

All definitions of what constitutes capital are capable of evasion. Payments for good will and other intangible assets can easily be made to appear on the books to have been made in cash. The general designation of "good will" is comprehensive enough to cover any kind of inflation in capital. On the other hand, many concerns of long-established standing have patents, trademarks, brands, and other intangible assets substantially valuable, developed over a period of years, for which no payment of cash appears upon the books.

This 8 per cent excess profits tax, with all the difficulties of administration, might have been tolerated while the rate of taxation was small, but now that these very heavy burdens are about to be imposed it becomes essential to entirely eliminate these inequalities in the tax and these difficulties of administration.

The only really logical basis for these heavy taxes on profits in this temporary war measure is the tax on war profits, and the Finance Committee has followed the logical and practical course in abandoning the whole idea of the excess profits tax, and providing for a war-profits tax upon a basis similar to that followed by European countries, in which this system has been successful. The difficulty with the war-profits tax is to define the base upon which the tax shall be computed. In the European countries a period of years has been taken, and after very careful consideration of the subject the time finally adopted as a prewar basic period is the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. This period was taken by the committee because, according to the recommendation of the Treasury experts and in the opinion of the committee the period was evidently the most favorable to the general mass of the taxpayers of the country. It is true that other basic periods and base lines have been suggested, but none of them have commanded general support in the business world, in the committee or with the Treasury Department. It is impossible to find any period that will bear with absolute equality on everyone. But the committee has made every effort to relieve any condition of hardship which this prewar period did not seem to deal fairly with; in other words, to afford a landing place for every business which claimed it would be in a condition of hardship under this arrangement.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps the Senator does not care to be interrupted.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not mind being interrupted.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Pennsylvania is discussing a subject which has interested me very much, and has given me a great deal of trouble considering the limited time I have had to devote to the consideration of this measure. He has just referred to the fact that they have used the profits for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 as the basic years from which to determine what would be normal profits. As I understand the operation of the bill it would be this: They take the profits for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, average them, and this average would constitute the normal profit, and any earnings of a corporation or an individual or a copartnership over and above this normal profit thus determined would be subject to the tax.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; that is earnings during the taxable year.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. That would leave this situation, as I understand it. Assume for the sake of argument that a given corporation makes during each of the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 an average profit of 50 per cent upon its capital stock. Then if during the current year it makes a profit of only 50 per cent upon its capital stock it would pay no war tax.

Mr. PENROSE. No; it would not.

Mr. POMERENE. If it made 55 per cent——

Mr. PENROSE. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, but I am going to make a suggestion to which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has called my attention. They would pay no war-profits tax but, of course, they would pay the 6 per cent normal tax and all the other taxes, but no war-profits tax because there were no war profits.

Mr. POMERENE. I so understood that.

Mr. PENROSE. And the surplus tax.

Mr. POMERENE. If it earned 55 per cent on its capital stock then the war tax would be on 5 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, let us take another illustration. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that we have a corporation which during the year 1911 made 2 per cent on its capital stock; during the year 1912, 4 per cent; and during the year 1913, 6 per cent, the average for the three years would be 4 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Assume that during the current year its net earnings would be 6 per cent. Then the difference between the 4 per cent and the 2 per cent would be subject to this war tax, would it not?

Mr. PENROSE. No; those earnings would be considered subnormal, and the taxpayer would have the right to appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury for an adjustment of his tax, and the Secretary of the Treasury would be permitted to average up the earnings of all the concerns in a similar business; that is, if it was a hosiery mill, he would take the earnings of the 20,000 or 30,000 hosiery mills in the country and average them up—a very simple proposition—and deduct that.

Mr. POMERENE. What does the Senator regard, under the provisions of the bill, as the subnormal earnings?

Mr. PENROSE. Anything is subnormal that is substantially lower than the average earnings in that business.

Mr. POMERENE. The average earnings of that corporation might all be——

Mr. PENROSE. No; in that business or in similar businesses. Suppose it was a hosiery mill and it has been making only 2 or 3 per cent. They apply to the Secretary of the Treasury for an adjustment of the tax, declare that their earnings are subnormal; and to ascertain whether they are subnormal or not he averages the earnings of representative hosiery mills in the country, or on such a basis of selection as he may adopt, and that would be the marginal lines between.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, as I understand the Senator, if the profit thus ascertained would be 10 per cent——

Mr. PENROSE. He would take 10 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Then anything above 10 per cent would be taxable?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. So if it earned 15 per cent, 5 per cent would be taxable?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. In the illustration I first used, the corporation might earn 50 per cent and none of it be taxable.

Mr. PENROSE. That is right; not on war profits, because there would be no war profits.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that distinction, but allow me to say it has seemed to me that it will operate as a very great injustice. I confess that it has troubled me a good deal. I can not see the justice of having any man or any partnership or any corporation escape a tax of that large amount.

Mr. PENROSE. They do not escape the tax. They pay all the other taxes but pay no war-profits tax, because there are no war profits.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that.

Mr. PENROSE. It is very unfortunate for them that they have no war profits, I suppose.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not mind a bit the interruption.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize the difficulties that must have confronted the Finance Committee in trying to work out some rule here, but I have been impressed with what seemed to me the injustice of having one corporation escape a war tax when its earnings are 50 per cent and another corporation be subject to the tax when it is perhaps earning only 20 per cent. It does seem to me all ought to contribute according to their profits as a general proposition.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course, the reply would be that there were no war profits, and if there had been war profits I have no doubt the taxpayer would be only too glad to have paid the tax.

This is a proposition to levy over $500,000,000 from the $3,000,000,000 of war profits which the tax returns of the Treasury Department indicate were the profits last year. It is a certified fund, and in view of the many thousands of taxpayers upon whom this tax is to be imposed, I can not see any inequality in it. Even if there are inequalities, it would be a physical impossibility to prevent some inequality in a nation as diverse and large as the United States, but I confess I do not see that there is an inequality.

Just the antithesis of the Senator's case is one the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] presented the other day of a concern that is making only ordinarily it may be subnormal profits and as a result of the war is now making 300 per cent. He was complaining because there was 50 per cent taken away under the bill here. That is a complaint on the other extreme. But the committee has made every effort to furnish a remedy to the taxpayer.

I will not repeat what I have said in my answer to the Senator from Ohio about the provision made for subnormal profits. Originally the suggestion was made that 6 per cent or 7 or 8 per cent should be made the minimum profit and anything below that should be subnormal. Universal complaint arose all over the country that 6 per cent was too low, and that even 8 per cent was too low, and so to extend still further relief and to get still further away from the idea of any necessity of computing capital the committee at the last moment adopted this idea of the average earnings in similar business, so that if a man is running a little hosiery establishment in Ohio or Pennsylvania with subnormal earnings during the prewar basic period he can go to the Treasury Department and by a very simple calculation get the average earnings of the business. Certainly no proposition could be fairer than that. It will even give him some advantage of a whole lot of people in the hosiery business whose incomes may be below the average line and yet are not subnormal. I am not prepared to say that there might not be modifications still added in this connection to the bill as it comes to the Senate, although I want to support the bill as nearly as I can as it is. It has been suggested that the taxpayers be allowed to select the best two out of the three years, the constant desire being to raise the base and further relieve the taxpayer. I would be prepared to vote for that, although the committee declined to put in their recommendation. As I have already stated, numerous other bases have been suggested, but none have commanded any general support.

Now, in relation to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] said about these concerns which make subnormal profits in a further effort to extend every relief possible to the taxpayer, the committee has made careful provisions for the cases where the capital used in the business is different for the taxable year from the average capital for the prewar period; where the average net income of the concern for the prewar period was below a normal return upon its investment; and where the concern was not in existence for a full calendar year during the prewar period. Special provision is made for these classes as follows:

First. Where the capital has been increased or decreased for the taxable year above or below the average of the prewar period, the average net income for the prewar period, for the purpose of ascertaining the war profits, is assumed to be increased or decreased in this same proportion.

Second. Where the Secretary of the Treasury finds either, first, that the net returns of a trade or business for the prewar period was low as compared with the net returns during such period of representative concerns engaged in a like or similar business, or, second, that during such period, the ratio between the net and gross income from such trade or business was substantially less than the like ratio in the case of representative trades or businesses, then the war profits of such trade or business shall be determined as in the case of a new concern.

Third. Where the concern was not in existence for one calendar year during the prewar period, or had no net income for the prewar period, the amount of the war profits shall be the same proportion of the net income for the taxable year which the war profits for the same calendar year of representative concerns engaged in a like or similar business, and whose war profits are computed in accordance with a general plan, bears to the net income for that year.

Under this amendment recommended by the committee the consideration of capital is entirely eliminated, and there is no necessity of adopting an arbitrary standard of a minimum percentage such as was originally suggested in the bill as it was first reported to the Senate by the committee, when 6 per cent was constituted as the minimum deduction in computing the tax.

The principle of the flat tax was also abandoned, and a graduated tax, beginning with a rate of 12 per cent of war profits not in excess of 15 per cent of the prewar profits, and reaching at its highest a rate of 50 per cent of the amount by which such profits exceed 250 per cent of the prewar profits as being more equitable than a flat tax, as being analogous to the graduated surtax on incomes, which is certainly far more equitable than would be a flat tax on incomes, and as being on the whole favorable to the smaller businesses of the country. There have been a comparatively few number of criticisms to this part of the bill as it stands at present. I think in many cases the objections are due to the fact that many of the taxpayers do not fully understand just what the final recommendation has been and are not familiar with the details of the bill in its present shape, and others are undergoing an awakening as to the fact that war taxes in the greatest war in history assume unexpectedly large proportions.

One strong argument in favor of the graduated war-profits taxes, in my opinion, is that it tends to correct and compensate in the case of high prices charged the consumer, whether it be the individual or the Government. It would be possible to frame a tax system of war profits, as I have already suggested, under which the Government could go into the open market, purchase the munitions and commodities required at fair prices, regulating evident cases of extortion or speculation or conspiracy, but getting the materials at once in a dreadful crisis where speedy delivery is the essence of the transaction and where delay in bargaining and haggling eventually results in tremendous losses in expenditures and in life, which can never be compensated in any way by the comparatively small sum saved. The Government would get back unduly high profits by high surtaxes. In this way the Government would get the results immediately and economic conditions would not be disturbed from the foundation up, and the maximum of production would be assured. But it seems impossible to obtain the necessary cooperation between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government in a coordinated policy of this kind in administration and in legislation; and I can only say that the graduated tax adopted by the committee will tend in the direction of regulating prices.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. PENROSE. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has stated, and I think the report of the committee states, that it is expected that a certain sum will be derived from the imposition of the so-called war-profits tax. I assume that estimate is based, roughly at least, upon the prices which are now being charged or received by many of our greatest industries for the things which they produce and sell upon the open market.

Mr. PENROSE. I know what the Senator is leading to, and I shall be glad to hear him go on in that line.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not criticizing the tax at all.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the committee has reached a most excellent conclusion. I was going to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if it is not probable that the estimate as to the amount of money which the Treasury may receive from the war-profits tax may be vastly overstated if it turns out that the Government, through other powers conferred upon it, either directly or indirectly, compels the sale of large amounts of supplies at lower prices and therefore reduces the so-called war profits?

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator is entirely right. All calculations of tax returns are upset, in my opinion, if they go too far with these prices.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PENROSE. With pleasure.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator, of course, has made a suggestion which would very materially affect the amount of profit which these particular concerns would earn; but, on the other hand, the concerns that were buying, for instance, from the iron and steel mills their iron and steel products at a lower rate would be able to increase their earnings. To illustrate, I have in mind now a manufacturer of hardware specialties in my own State, who wrote me the other day that up to perhaps two years ago he paid, as I now recall the figures, $35 a ton for the steel which he used in making these specialties, and at the time of his writing the price for the same steel was $130 a ton. Of course, if he could get his steel for substantially less than $130 a ton, necessarily he could increase his profits. So I do not know how we could determine it with any degree of exactness.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania let me comment upon that illustration?

Mr. PENROSE. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is perfectly true, as the Senator says, that the hardware specialty manufacturer will make heavier profits if he can obtain steel at a lower price. By such operation the Steel Corporation will not have a large war-profit tax, and it will be assumed that the hardware specialty company will have a larger war-profit tax than would otherwise be the case. But that, in turn, is based upon the assumption that the hardware specialty company will not reduce the price of its products to the public.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator from New York has struck at the jugular vein of the proposition. The theory that I have referred to is that the Government could wisely create a purchasing board and let them go into the open market, as they did in the Civil War, and invite bids and make purchases at fair prices, and then levy a surtax, I do not care if you make it 80 per cent, that will bring the money back to the Government. You are not interfering with the current of trade and you are not striking at the very fundamentals of economics. I know it is not possible, because of the fact that the executive and legislative branches of the Government are not sufficiently coordinated at this time to do anything like that. I understand there are a long series of orders of the most important munitions which have been held up for two months haggling over prices, asking the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the cost of production, a thing that would take them until long after the war was over and most of us were tottering old men. In the meanwhile every 10 days a billion dollars is spent and 10,000 men are killed every day. Prices are the least important feature of the whole transaction. Delivery is what you want, and unless something is done in that direction I for one look with horror at the result. I have read that at the outbreak of the Civil War we practically had no Navy; the South had none at all; and within a year the coast line and the rivers and the lakes were covered with flotillas and fleets of effective battleships. Under the present method of procedure it would take 20 years.

I am nearly through, Mr. President. The other proposition to which I have referred as having given the committee many perplexing questions to consider, and as having invited a widespread criticism, is the amendment providing for originally a 15 per cent tax on the surplus or undistributed earnings of corporations. The proposition as was originally reported by the Finance Committee to the Senate was widely criticized all over the country as being a very serious blow to the solvency and the ability for development of corporations at a time when the greatest expansion was required. I shall not go into these details now. It is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, the objections were well founded, although the object in view—to reach incomes which apparently in the case of corporations were escaping taxation and was supposed in some cases to be an abuse—was ably presented and the purpose was, of course, laudable.

The committee therefore came to the conclusion that it has been the custom of corporations for well recognized and sound economic reasons to retain in the business a considerable proportion of their annual earnings, and that more especially the present situation calls for unusual outlays for purposes of extension and development to meet the demands and requirements of the situation and the increased difficulty in borrowing money on satisfactory terms and conditions caused by the large demand of the Government upon the investing public to float its securities; and therefore the further amendment was adopted making the tax on surplus and undistributed profits 10 per cent, including that part of such surplus not employed in the business, but not taxing that part of the surplus retained to be expended in the business or held for the reasonable requirements of the business, subject to the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; in other words, this particular provision as it now stands will reach surplus invested or retained in ways not connected with the business, but will exempt all surplus expended or held for reasonable requirements.

I am not in sympathy with that part of the committee's recommendation in favor of the repeal of the drawback provisions of existing law in relation to sugar.

Mr. President, I shall not go any further at the present time in the discussion of the details of the measure. I rose to speak in a general way upon some of the features in the bill to which attention has been particularly called in a very large correspondence and in the discussions in the committee, and more especially to define my own attitude when I expressed my intention to vote for the bill so long as it remains approximately in its present shape.

No bill of this kind can be framed to meet the views of everyone. The measure, in its way, is an encyclopedia. It touches the very arteries of our economic system. It must be passed as speedily as possible. It will raise the revenue, and it constitutes a framework founded on a logical basis for temporary war legislation. I shall, during the consideration of the measure and as occasion arises, take opportunity to explain and debate at greater length some of the details of the bill. I have only desired now to present some general observations as to some of the leading features of the measure.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make the point of——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina was about to make a point of no quorum, but while I should prefer to go on to-morrow with the discussion, it being now rather late in the evening, I shall try to make my remarks as brief as possible and cover some of the questions involved in the pending measure.

Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Finance has spoken in explanation and justification of the particular items and sources from which it is proposed to derive war revenues for this fiscal year; but it seems to me that in connection with this presentation something should be said concerning the fundamental policy which the majority of the committee propose to follow in financing this war, the reasons for this policy, the probable burdens which will be imposed on the country, and how such burdens should be distributed. It is to these questions I wish to direct my remarks. But before proceeding I feel I would be derelict in duty did I not first express to the chairman of the committee my appreciation of his patience and painstaking efforts throughout the more than two months of arduous effort required to perfect the measure now before the Senate. No one not a member of that committee can fully comprehend the scope of the investigation required or the complexity of all the intricate details which had to be tested as to their effect upon every business of the country before acceptance by the committee.

It will not be claimed by anyone that this war-tax bill operates with exact and equal justice toward all persons or all industries. I feel safe in saying, however, that the whole effort of the committee has been to make the bill as free from the criticism of inequality and injustice as possible. It is very easy to point out inequalities in the measure. It is very difficult, however, to propose a remedy or substitute which will give us the required revenue without creating far greater inequalities.

The chairman of the committee in his report and in his speech has explained and elucidated each item of the bill. I shall not at this time enter into the field of detail. I shall content myself with placing upon the record my own conviction and the views, at least, of some others of the committee on what should be the fundamental policy of this Government in raising the revenue necessary to carry on this war from now to its final conclusion, whether it be for 1 year or 5 years or 10 years.

The very first question that naturally arises in the consideration of a war-revenue bill is, What proportion of the war burden shall be imposed upon this generation and what upon the coming generations? Inseparably connected with this question are the further ones: What is the great objective sought by this war? Who will be the beneficiaries of the blessings which this war, if victorious, will assure? Who will be best able to shoulder the vast expenses in money which this war must necessarily entail? If one generation gives the lifeblood of its manhood that the succeeding generation may enjoy the blessings of peace, unhampered by the crushing load of armaments, or unfrightened by the demon of war, what is the least that may be expected of the latter, as a partial equivalent for this mighty sacrifice by the former?

There are many who propose that this generation should bear the whole burden of this war; that we should issue no bonds for future generations to pay; that posterity should be relieved of the burden which we have incurred by reason of our entering into this conflict; that the generation which incurred the debt should pay the debt. A more unjust doctrine could scarcely be imagined. There is no element of justice in such a crucifixion of one generation for the tranquillity of another.

Mr. President, we can not, we must not, emerge from this conflict until the great nations of the earth have entered into a binding and solemn international obligation signed and sealed by each and every one of them defining and proclaiming the inherent and inalienable rights of every nation, great and small—the right of each to live and work out its own destiny, free from the shadow of impending war or the danger of annihilation by some mighty military neighbor—an obligation requiring every nation of the world to follow that code of morals in its international relations which each nation imposes upon its own people in their individual relations—that no nation shall rob a weaker nation of its territory; that it shall not murder its people; that it shall not deprive another of its independence or infringe upon its sovereign rights—an international obligation that, subject to these inherent and inalienable rights of individual nations, shall provide for a court in which every international dispute must be settled, and obligating this world family of nations to jointly enforce the decrees of such court and thereby forever prevent the recurrence of such a holocaust of blood as now incarmines all Europe.

Unless this war is fought to such a finish, then this conflict will have been worse than in vain. Unless we are prepared to fight it to this finish, we have committed a grievous crime against humanity and our own people in ever entering into it. Unless we are so prepared we should withdraw now, shameful as that course would be. That we can not and will not do. We will battle for the liberty and happiness not so much for ourselves as for future generations. We will give the blood and treasure of this generation to our full capabilities. This generation will die that the next may remain free. This generation will suffer that the next may live under the reign of peace and justice. Why, in Heaven's name, then, should not the next generation shoulder its share of the financial burden for the immeasurable blessings by this generation bequeathed?

If we succeed in bringing about such a world peace as I have mentioned, if we relieve future generations from the onerous load of taxation for armaments, even though the entire financial cost of this war is charged to them, they still should call us blessed. This view accords not only with justice but also with all history.

Suppose we had fought the War of the Revolution with the idea that that generation must take care of the burden of that war by a present taxation. In such case, Mr. President, there would have been no United States of America. Suppose in the great Civil War we had determined that that generation, which was pouring out its blood in lavish streams, should by taxation raise all the revenue required to bring about a reunion of the States. There would have been no reunion. The attempt to shoulder all the burden upon the generation of that day would have been worse than a failure. As it was, the bonds bearing 6 and 7 per cent interest, issued during the Civil War, and often heavily discounted, were carried over to the days of peace, and the succeeding generations have borne the burden and paid off the debt without the slightest hardship and without any diminution in their rapid strides toward prosperity and wealth.

So the generations which shall succeed us, whose numbers will be vastly augmented, and whose energies, relieved from the heavy draft which world conditions up to this date have imposed upon its people to defend themselves against each other, energies which can and will be expended in the field of productive industries, will be able to lightly bear the burden of this war debt, no matter how colossal its figures may be.

Nor must we forget, Mr. President, this very important fact: The dollars of the future which will pay these war bonds will be very much cheaper and therefore very much more easily earned than the present dollars which these bonds represent. These bonds will be paid in standard gold dollars of present weight and fineness. Within the last quarter of a century new and scientific methods of gold mining and extraction have so increased the output as to reduce the gold dollar nearly one-half. These methods will continue with ever-increasing efficiency, so that in all probability the last bonds will be paid in dollars that will measure in purchasing value less than one-half the value of the present dollars.

And so, Mr. President, exclusive of that moral debt of deepest gratitude which a peace-assured future will owe to the warring present, the portion of the debt passed to the future will be paid by numbers increasing to probably three times the present population of the country, and paid in dollars decreasing to probably less than one-half the value of the present dollar.

Mr. President, unless an exhausted Europe brings about peace before we actually get into this war, we may need to put into the field and maintain an army of at least 5,000,000 men, and we shall, in addition, tax ourselves very heavily to support and maintain this force. This should be the limit of our donation, the extent of our sacrifice. The war debt should be borne by our emancipated children, who will be a hundredfold better able to liquidate it.

The next important question which presents itself in the consideration of a war-revenue measure is to determine with a reasonable degree of accuracy the full amount of the tax which will be imposed upon the Nation and the probable duration of the conflict. Any committee upon which is imposed the duty of formulating a revenue bill to meet a great situation which fails to measure the importance and possibilities of such a situation, its duration, the extent of the burdens which it will impose upon the people, and the ability of the people to respond to its demands has poorly performed its duty.

Let us, therefore, first take a general, comprehensive view of the colossal task which we have undertaken. Mr. President, the people of this country have never realized, and do not realize to-day, the power, the resources in territory and population, and the many other advantages which the central nations of Europe and their allies have over the entente allies or the vulnerability and dangers which threaten our most important ally in this war.

I want to do what I can to make the people realize the immensity and more than seriousness of the task which this Government has assumed in this world war. And, Mr. President, I am not deviating from the consideration of this revenue bill in now placing the realities of the task before us on the record, because we can only take accurate measurement of the requirements of this bill by a comprehensive view of the war situation which the bill is designed to meet.

Mr. President, I have never joined in the optimistic view expressed in the Senate and in the American press everywhere concerning the immediate success of the Russian revolution or the reentry of Russia as a valuable or aggressive force into this war. Considering her vast population, Russia has never been in this war as a real and effective force. I am doubtful if she has not, by her entering the war, been an actual help to the central powers. I am reasonably certain that if she had remained neutral and had simply declined to furnish the German Government with supplies, she would have been of far greater assistance to the allies. Even before her revolution, and I want Senators to bear this in mind, through the incapacity of her officers she had furnished Germany with more than 2,000,000 strong, able-bodied prisoners, who cultivated her fields and supplied her labor demands while the German troops were at the front. To-day she is out of the war entirely. In my candid opinion she will not get into the war as an effective power before its close. She must pass through the crucible of fire and blood which other peoples have had to endure in like cases before she will learn the lesson that liberty and law must ever walk hand in hand, that somewhere there must be lodged a power whose law is supreme, a power which all must obey. Before she will ever be able to unite her vast energies she must solidify her character. The lesson of obedience to law must be burned into her brain by fire and written upon her breast in blood. I therefore eliminate Russia in computing the resources and powers of the battling nations.

Viewing the European territory on whose soil this conflict is raging, we can not but be impressed with the territorial magnitude of the central nations and their allies as compared with that of their opponents. Here is the great central section of Europe, the richest section of that continent in all that makes for twentieth century necessities and requirements of life, reaching from the Baltic on the north to the Mediterranean, the Black, and the Ægean Seas on the south. Here is Germany, with an area of 208,780 square miles of territory; Austria-Hungary, including Bosnia and Herzegovina, with an area of 260,034 square miles; Bulgaria, with 43,000 square miles; Turkey, with 710,224 square miles, or a total of 1,222,038 square miles. In addition to this, the central powers are in actual possession of and are utilizing all the resources of Belgium, with her 11,302 square miles; Serbia, with her 34,000 square miles. She occupies nearly all of Roumania, or substantially 39,000 square miles. She is in possession of 109,391 square miles of Russia, 7,595 square miles of France, 5,530 square miles of Montenegro, 7,800 square miles of Albania, making a total of enemy country in her possession of 214,618 square miles, or a grand total of 1,436,656 square miles of territory in Europe of unequaled richness that is giving its substance in this war against our allies.

Mr. President, from the very beginning of this war the press of this country, allowing its sympathies to sway its judgment, permitting the wish to father the thought, has misled the people concerning the ability of the central powers to sustain themselves and their armies during a long military contest.

The press, and through the press the American people, have assumed, from the moment the British fleet had driven German commerce from the ocean, that cut off from their foreign supplies of food and other necessary products, the central powers would begin to weaken, and that with a rigid blockade there would be nothing for the entente powers to do except to check further advance of the central hosts on land and calmly await their certain exhaustion through lack of supplies.

I want Senators to look at the map of Europe on the wall for a moment and to observe the vast proportion of that continent which is to-day yielding its wealth of agricultural and mineral products to sustain the central armies. The blue lines inclose the original territories of those powers, together with the adjacent enemy territory now held by them and supplying their demands. Compare that vast territory with the territory of Great Britain, France, and Italy. Then just recall what we have read of the natural resources of central Europe. Bulgaria has always raised a surplus of agricultural products, and with intensified farming and a reasonable conservation of food supplies, that great section of central Europe can produce sufficient food to supply its people and its armies for an indefinite number of years.

If Senators will observe on the map the blue line running from the Gulf of Riga, in the eastern portion of the Baltic Sea, in a southeasterly direction to the Black Sea, cutting off a portion only of Roumania which joins Russia; thence along the Black Sea and around Turkey, and again cutting across the peninsula, the southern extremity of which is Greece; thence following up the Adriatic Sea, again cutting inland on the northern line of Switzerland; and thence in a northwesterly direction taking in a portion of France, they will observe the immensity of the territory in one compact body whose resources to-day are supplying the great central powers.

So, Mr. President, peace will not come through the lack of physical resources of the enemy powers. I am morally certain that this war can only be ended in one of three ways. First, by the warring people themselves, becoming tired of a slaughter which so far has led to no definite results, forcing a peace. This prospect at present is not very bright. Second, by conquering the submarine. If that menace could be met the hope of the central powers to crush France and starve Great Britain would soon fade. Those powers are relying with implicit faith on our inability to cope with their submarines, and to-day, Mr. President, their faith seems to be well founded. The prospect of the submarine gradually destroying the shipping, upon which Great Britain is so dependent, seems just as certain to-day as it did during the earlier months of unrestricted submarine warfare. It may be that Germany will have to postpone for a few months the completion of the program outlined by her involving the destruction of a sufficient amount of the tonnage of the world to starve out England, but at the present time she is certainly destroying tonnage to an amount more than two and a half times greater than can be supplied by the world in the same length of time. Third, and what appears to me to be the only certain means of bringing victory to our arms, is by raising and putting into the line of battle 5,000,000 men and sustaining and equipping them. The forces of Petain and Haig must be augmented until they can by irresistible force regain Belgium, Serbia, Roumania, and the enemy-occupied French territory. That is the colossal task on which we must fix our gaze. That is the task to finance which we must shape our revenue legislation.

Compared with that mighty territory we have in Europe, Great Britain and Ireland, with 121,331 square miles of territory; France, with 207,054 square miles; Italy, with 110,623 square miles; or a total of 439,008 square miles. In Europe, therefore, the territorial domain of the entente powers compared with that of the central powers is about one to three and one-fourth, the one scattered and disconnected, the three and one-fourth contiguous and compact. It must also be remembered that vast stretches of the island of Great Britain are mountainous and unproductive. Let us also recall, Mr. President, that German armies to-day occupy foreign territory, and are utilizing the resources of that enemy territory in a number of square miles greater than all of Germany, Germany being about 208,000 square miles in extent, and the adjacent territory which she now occupies and holds and uses about 214,000 square miles.

Considering the populations from which the soldiery is drawn, we find Germany with a population of 66,715,000; Austria-Hungary, with 50,000,000; Bulgaria, 4,755,000; Turkey, with 21,274,000; or a total population of 142,744,000. Against this we have France, with a population of 39,601,509; Great Britain and Ireland, with 45,264,245; Italy, with 35,598,000; or a total population of 120,463,754. In man resources the power of the entente allies as compared with that of their opponents is greatly inferior. If we should take into consideration Canada, with her 8,000,000 population, and Australia, with about 3,000,000, still the central powers would outnumber the entente powers in population. I am not considering India or Japan, as the forces taken from India are very meager and possibly no greater than are supplied to that country and other adjacent territory for the preservation of order; and Japan, though called a belligerent, is now occupying a position of negation only. And, Mr. President, we must also deduct from the entente population that portion inhabiting the territory in possession of the central powers and add that same number to the central powers population.

At this time not a foot of German territory is in possession of the enemy, while she governs and controls and utilizes an enemy territory greater in area than her own. All the ravages, all of the destruction, all of the sufferings of this devastating war are outside the German borders. Her resources have not been touched by enemy hands. Her prisoners, mostly from Russia, cultivate her fields and produce the food for her soldiers.

Nor is this the only advantage which is held by the central powers. For nearly half a century the German powers have expended all their surplus energies and all their genius in the preparation for a world war. Every railway, every road, every canal has been built or dug with the dominating idea of its usefulness in war. Every foot of adjacent foreign territory has been mapped out by her war officers and photographed by her spies. She has studied out where to strike and how to strike her enemy and constructed her railways to the point of attack. She has planned so that in event of war she could seize, before a force could be accumulated to stand the shock of her arms, the richest portion of France, Belgium, and Russia—could seize and hold the coal, the iron, and the agricultural provinces of her neighbors and utilize their resources. From her borders to Berlin she is surrounded and protected by forts after forts, defenses after defenses. She can move her guns or her vast armies from one line of battle to another, from one border to the opposite border, in a few hours. She can accomplish in these hours what the allies would require weeks to perform.

Mr. Gerard, our ambassador to Germany, up to the time of our declaration of war, brings this information to the American people concerning the war power of this great nation. In an article written only a few days ago he says:

> I want to tell them that the military and naval power of the German Empire is unbroken; that of the 12,000,000 men whom the Kaiser has called to the colors but 1,500,000 have been killed, 500,000 permanently disabled, not more than 500,000 are prisoners of war, and about 500,000 constitute the number of wounded or on the sick list each day, leaving at all times about 9,000,000 effective under arms. I state these figures because Americans do not grasp either the magnitude or the importance of this war. Perhaps the statement that more than 5,000,000 prisoners of war are held in the various countries will bring home to Americans the enormous mass of men engaged. There have been no great losses in the German Navy, and any losses of ships have been compensated for by the building of new ones. The 9,000,000 men and more—for at least 400,000 come of military age in Germany every year—because of their experience in two and a half years of war, are better and more efficient soldiers than at the time they were called to the colors.

On the other hand, Great Britain, the country which to-day is furnishing the strongest sinews of this war and bearing the brunt in the destruction of her merchant vessels, had prior to this war given practically no consideration to her military prowess. Realizing her precarious situation in case her enemies should be able to cut off her avenues of ocean trade she has developed and maintained an enormous navy, only to find that in the days of her direst needs her vast dreadnaughts are impotent to shield her ocean commerce, on which her very life depends, against the deadly and, so far, invincible submarine.

So, too, while Germany has been studying the science of war as no other nation in the world and perfecting her officers in that science, Great Britain, like the United States, has done little or nothing. Great Britain had at the beginning of the war no strong generals capable of comprehending the vastness of the situation. She had to develop her officers at an enormous sacrifice. She has suffered as no other nation for this inefficiency, both on land and sea, at Gallipoli and at the Dardanelles. Like ourselves, she seems to have been dreaming during the earlier months of the war while the central powers were building submarines in sufficient numbers to pounce upon and annihilate the commerce of the world.

Nor are these the only advantages which Germany and her allies possess. That vast central Europe is one single, compact body. With a degree of economy and intensified farming that territory can produce practically all that is necessary to support the armies and civil population. Great Britain, on the other hand, must draw her livelihood from every section of the earth. She must guard her merchant marine all over the face of the earth in order to secure food for her people and raw products for her industries. Her sea isolation is an element of weakness at all times, and since the advent of the submarine has become a most serious weakness—a crisis involving the very life of the nation itself. Had either of these nations—Great Britain or the United States—relied less upon rutted opinion of naval experts and more upon the unfettered genius of the two countries, had they fully realized what every thoughtful layman realized, the possibilities of submarine warfare; had they given even at a later date, when the danger was too manifest to be longer ignored, proper thought to the subject of protection of merchant shipping against torpedoes, rather than concentrating all their thought upon the question of the destruction of the submarine, I feel satisfied that we would to-day have had vessels plying between the United States and Great Britain and France which would have been practically immune from destruction by torpedo. Even in the midst of this fearful devastation we are not giving that subject due and proper consideration.

The United States is now called into this war. We have the population, we have the wealth, we have the resources, but we are from three to four thousand miles from the scene of conflict, separated by an ocean infested by the submarine menace, which will involve enormous losses and enormous expense if we are able to keep open a channel of communication for our troops and their munitions, food, and clothing.

So, Mr. President, in looking at the matter from a comprehensive viewpoint, we can discern some contingencies with certainty. The first is that unless we succeed in meeting the submarine menace our allies will be defeated before we can get into this war. Germany relies upon this with a growing confidence. All of her statesmen have declared that all she needs to do is to act on the defensive along the western line, holding the enemy at bay while her submarines accomplish the annihilation of the world's shipping; second, if we shall be able to meet those ravages, if we can hold the submarine in such bounds as to keep afloat sufficient vessels to supply our own armies and our allies, we shall still have before us a war that will last for years before any victory can be achieved. If we allow this war to close, leaving the situation just as it was before the war, then we can rest assured that the same causes will bring about the same result, and that our children must meet that which we have been unable, through inability or lack of courage, to settle. That we must not do.

Therefore, in framing a revenue bill we must contemplate a war of several years' duration, each year requiring an ever greater outlay in treasure. That treasure must be collected from the American people. It must be collected from a people who have sufficient prosperity to enable them to meet its demands.

Mr. President, I have thus far tried to present the magnitude of the task before us that we might begin to realize the vast expense which we shall be called upon to meet, and so apportion that expense as not to exhaust the country before the final victory is achieved. We all learn quite early in life how to conserve our energies to meet exacting tasks. If we were required to drive a team of horses 60 miles in the shortest possible time without serious injury to those faithful servants of man, we would first take account of their capacity for endurance and then we would exercise especial care to hold them in check for at least one-half or two-thirds of the distance to be covered, conserving their energies for the last lap, in which we would not only give free rein but, by the use of the lash, force exertion to the limit. That rule of reason is just as applicable in dealing with the taxes we must extort from the business of this country to carry this war to its final goal. There is a limit to our capacity, our endurance. We must conserve the capital energy of the country, that it may meet the onerous demands of the last year of the conflict. The nation which strikes the last blow, Mr. President, is the nation that will win, rather than the nation that is able to strike the first blow. We might raise this year by taxation all that would be expended this year, but if we did so we should surely exhaust ourselves before the second year.

My judgment was that we should not have attempted to raise more than one billion additional by taxation this year. I should have favored issuing serial bonds which would have covered a period of 30 years for the far greater portion of the expenses of the war. But the committee in its wisdom has thought it best to raise by taxation this year a sum considerably in excess of what I deemed advisable and has brought in a bill to raise $2,000,000,000 for the year ending June 30, 1918, in addition to about $1,000,000,000 which the present law will provide. We shall need to levy more the next year. And, Mr. President, as the business of this country is the only source from which we can draw this revenue, so we should guard with the greatest care every legitimate American industry. We should cripple none. To do so would be a suicidal policy. We should be careful that we do not use the taxing ax at the root of the tree of business, whose fruits in increasing quantity we must annually gather.

I have not sought by my vote in the committee to confiscate by taxation all of the earnings of the people above what is reasonable and necessary. I have not been overfearful that some might make more money than they might need in their business. The money remains in the country. The savings of one year usually become the capital for the next year. And if those savings go into additional active capital, we have just what we shall need—a broader line of business, a more extensive field from which to draw each succeeding year, and this we must have because each succeeding year will require heavier and heavier tax burdens. Each year we must sell more bonds. The money that goes into bonds must be that which has been earned in addition to that which is paid out in taxes. The same earnings can not go into both taxes and bonds. There should, therefore, be a liberal leeway between earnings and taxation.

Let it therefore be well understood that the committee in presenting this revenue bill has presented only the first installment of the tax legislation it has in mind. The whole tax scheme has in contemplation a period that will cover several years. During that period, unless the war comes to a sudden and unexpected end, in my judgment we shall need to expend not less than $40,000,000,000. The principal portion of this expense must be raised by the sale of bonds, the balance by tax levies. As the cash to meet both, however, must be derived from the same source—business profits—it goes without saying that the tax levies and bond sales must be so adjusted as not to conflict with or destroy each other.

It has been suggested by some who form their judgment on first impulses that we should begin by confiscating all excessive incomes, as for example, all incomes above 8 per cent. At first glance that would seem to be both feasible and just, but let us see to what end this course would lead us. It must be apparent to anyone that if you threaten to cripple or unduly hamper the business of the country, upon whose profits we must depend for our revenues, you drive capital out of business, and to that extent you decrease the source of supply and thereby diminish not only the revenue from taxation but also the amount available for bond purchases.

Mr. President, there is a large element of risk in all lines of productive business. The greater the risk the greater must be the inducement of alluring dividends to tempt capital to invest in such undertakings. If, through the taxing power, you limit the profits to a fairly low basis, with no corresponding guaranty of the capital itself against loss, capital will not take the risk. Deprived, then, of the revenue which this capital ought to produce through a tax on its profits, the Government would be compelled to issue additional bonds to secure the necessary funds to prosecute the war.

But here again the bonds must seek the same field to find their purchasers and will suffer the same from a diminished income, due to unemployed or unprofitably employed capital. The Government would then be compelled to increase the rate of interest on its bonds to secure the necessary war money, and this increased interest rate, together with the nontaxable character of the bonds, would draw upon the capital of the country itself, rather than the income from capital. This capital would then cease to be active capital producing a tax-paying income for the Government and become a dead capital, drawing yearly interest from the Government. That condition, Mr. President, must be avoided. How can it be avoided? It can only be avoided by giving assurance to the business of the country that it will be allowed a return upon its investment, after paying its governmental taxes, very considerably in excess of nontaxable interest received from Government bonds.

Mr. President, under existing law we shall raise by taxation for the fiscal year approximately $1,000,000,000. Of the $2,006,970,000 additional which is proposed to be raised by a tax levy, $1,339,700,000 is to be raised by additional tax on incomes and war profits, and $667,270,000 from other sources. The amount to be raised from incomes is so graded that the burden falls most lightly on the small incomes and most heavily on the larger ones, the gradations running from 1 per cent on the small to 49.89 per cent on the larger ones.

I believe, Mr. President, that this is as heavy a levy as we can safely make without guiding our course into a field where disastrous results would follow. Do you stop to contemplate what is most liable to occur when you take 50 per cent of any income for taxes? Let us suppose that the average business pays 7 per cent net. Here stands the Government, then, offering its own bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, which are not subject to any taxation whatever, and at the same time taking 50 per cent or one-half of the very great incomes. Can you not see that it would be more profitable for those persons having these large incomes to invest their capital in Government bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest rather than in an enterprise that would yield them 7 per cent net, one-half of which would go to the Government? Do you not observe that their net income would be the same, and by investing their capital in Government bonds they would, in addition, escape all the chance and responsibility of business, and all further taxes?

What I want to see, and I am certain what we all want, is that the small concerns of the country, the poorer class, and those of moderate means, shall make sufficient profits to enable them to purchase and hold most of the Government bonds, and that the money of the great capitalists may continue in business and respond in taxes for the support of the Government in the future rather than in the form of an investment in Government bonds which draw interest from the Government. I am certain, Mr. President, that 50 per cent is as high as we can afford to tax even the large incomes without forcing a vast amount of the capital of the country, now engaged in productive business, into the purchase of Government bonds.

It may be that industrial or financial conditions in Great Britain and other countries are such that the Government can safely levy a greater income tax. I do not believe, for the reasons given, that we can safely do so.

But it is pressed upon us that in some lines of business capital will reap enormous profits during this war. If they do from now on, Mr. President, it will be because the Government—the administration—has failed to do its duty. We have during this session enacted laws and put into the hands of the President ample power to compel every manufacturer and producer in the country, whether of war munitions and equipment or of foods and clothing, to conduct his business for a fair and reasonable profit. The President asked these powers for the protection of the Government and of the people, and Congress responded to the request unstintingly. The President having asked these powers for a definite purpose, and Congress having granted the powers for that very purpose—the prevention of unreasonable charges—are we not compelled to assume that the President will not fail to exercise the powers given? I am free to say I believe the power will be used and that unconscionable profits will not hereafter be allowed to the American manufacturers and producers.

I believe that we will get the revenue that has been estimated by the department for the year ending June 30, 1918, because these enormous profits have already continued from the last fiscal year up to the present time, and undoubtedly they will continue for some months before the power of the Government is felt, reducing them to a reasonable basis.

The President has already notified munitions and arms factories that they must furnish their products to the allies at the same price that is paid by our own Government. These great profits which have been made during the last three years by taking advantage of the necessities of the warring powers must and ought to cease now that we have entered into that war. I assume they will cease, because I believe the laws will be enforced.

I have more fear that the Government will be imposed upon, as I believe it has already been grossly imposed upon, by contractors and subcontractors in constructive work and various other lines in which Government appropriations will be expended.

But if any concern should escape the watchful eye of the administration and earn excessive profits, it can not escape this revenue dragnet, which, with its taxes and surtaxes, its normal taxes and its excess taxes, its double and treble taxes, will in some form or other draw such profits into the war chest.

Mr. President, in what I have already said I have fulfilled my purpose—that of presenting the broader aspects of the situation which this revenue bill is intended to meet, and especially to call to the attention of the people of the country the mighty task they have undertaken in this war, the many billions of dollars which will of necessity be expended before the object of the war shall have been accomplished, and above all the necessity, the paramount necessity, of maintaining an industrial and a commercial prosperity throughout the country upon which we can rely for the sinews of this war until through victory we may assure to the world a just and lasting peace.

Probably no single member of the committee agrees with every provision in this bill. In its final form, however, the divers views of the members have been coalesced as much as possible. It is but the first great step in raising revenue for an unprecedented war. It will have to be extended to cover other fields, and undoubtedly will have to be modified as experience may suggest. It answers the present purpose, and, in my opinion, should be speedily enacted into law that every line of business may know its scope and limitation and adjust itself to its requirements.

For the benefit of those who may read the RECORD and to bring before them in a concrete and understandable form just what revenue is expected to be raised by this bill, in addition to the revenue which will be collected under existing law, through what sources the additional sums are to be secured and the amount estimated from each source, together with the total income tax on incomes ranging from $1,200 to $100,000,000 and other important items, I ask permission to append to these remarks certain explanatory tables.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am going to move a recess, but before doing so I wish to say to Senators that there is every indication now that general debate on this bill will not be very much prolonged. I trust that we shall finish the general debate either to-morrow or the next day. As soon as we have finished the general speeches I shall ask the Senate to take up the committee amendments. So I feel compelled to object to the interjection of any measure except a conference report until we have finished the pending bill.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator if he expects to reach a vote on the amendments to-morrow?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. CURTIS. There are a number of Senators absent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know of but two Senators who are ready to speak. It may be possible that there are others, but I do not know. If there are no other general speeches to be made to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to take up the amendments to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. A number of Senators are absent who will be here day after to-morrow, and they are very anxious to be here when the amendments are considered. I should like to have time to notify them, as they expected the debate to run until about Friday, I think.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I do not think there are many Senators on the minority side, anyhow, neither do I believe there are many on the majority side, who intend to make general speeches. There are doubtless a number of Senators who will take advantage of some title or schedule of the bill to make general remarks. I think we can proceed with the details of the measure certainly by Wednesday.

Mr. SIMMONS. I anticipate that we shall probably reach amendments by Wednesday, but if there is no one ready to go on to-morrow I would not be disposed to waste the day, and I should insist upon beginning with the amendments to-morrow.

Mr. GORE. We could take up unobjected amendments and proceed with those.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 14, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] and to let the announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absent Senators.

EXPORTS OF COTTON.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator in charge of the pending bill will permit me, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a statement of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers containing certain statistics relative to exports of cotton, which I think will be found to be of great interest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made. The Statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COTTON MANUFACTURERS.

"We quote from the President's appeal to business men, as follows:

"'Patriotism leaves profits out of the question. In these days of our supreme trial, when we are sending hundreds of thousands of our young men across the seas to serve a great cause, no true man who stays behind to work for them and sustain them by his labor will ask himself what he is personally going to make out of that labor. No true patriot will permit himself to take toll of their heroism in money or seek to grow rich by the shedding of their blood. He will give as freely and with as unstinted self-sacrifice as they. When they are giving their lives, will he not give at least his money?'

"If the administration expects every man to do his duty, the administration must not fail on its part to protect the country. It is generally conceded that the business men of the country have not failed in their duty since the first of April, when the President broke off diplomatic relations with Germany. Many of the business men have given up practically their whole time to the service of the Government without pay. No one who is at all familiar with the situation has questioned for a moment the patriotism of the business men throughout the country. Some of them are wondering, however, why the administration is apparently failing on their part to carry on this war as a business man would carry it on. So far nothing whatever has been done to control the exports of cotton, which is the basis of explosives, and which has been leaking into Germany through several sources. It would be a deplorable condition to find out several months hence that our own cotton is being used to manufacture explosives in Germany with which to fight our own Army, when we had the power from the start to see that this did not happen.

"The following startling figures have been submitted to the members of the Defense Council and its advisory board, to show that Germany has obtained tremendous quantities of this commodity from neutral countries. For instance, it has been shown that in 1914 Sweden alone sent into Germany approximately 9,800,000 pounds of cotton. These are the last figures available in regard to the exports of that country into Germany. Between 90,000,000 and 100,000,000 pounds of cotton from this country above what is believed to be the normal requirements of the neutrals of Europe is believed to have been taken by them since the war began. That statement is based on official figures which have been submitted to the Government. Spain, Denmark, Holland, Sweden, and Norway have imported vastly in excess of their need. In the year 1913–14, just before the war, they received about 335,000 bales; in 1914 they received 1,998,000 bales, an amount which finds no precedent in the export history of America; and in 1915–16 they received 525,000 bales.

	Holland.	Norway.	Sweden.	Denmark.	Spain.
	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.	Bales.
1913–14	35,000	2,000	28,000	.....	270,000
1914–15	520,000	48,000	750,444	35,000	470,000
1915–16	100,000	16,000	65,000	.....	530,000

"Besides the figures given above we are attaching four sets of statistics along the same line, which are most illuminating.

"The cotton textile interests of the country in a spirit of pure patriotism have offered their services to the Government to control these exports that none may reach Germany. What is the Government doing toward this control which is so vital to the successful prosecution of this war?

"Under date of July 17, the resignation of Dr. Edward E. Pratt, Chief of the Commerce Department Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, was forwarded to President Wilson at the request of Secretary Redfield. The cotton textile manufacturers of this country consider the question of the export control of cotton so vital a factor in the conduct of the war that they have passed several resolutions requesting an export control not only of cotton but of anything manufactured from cotton. As chief of the bureau, Dr. Pratt was in active charge of the Government's control of exports and several manufacturers have consulted him as to the best method to pursue in the handling of this control. These same manufacturers are now wondering what the administration intends to do about the control of cotton exports.

"At a joint meeting of the foreign trade committee of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers and the foreign trade committee of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association held in Washington June 22, 1917, the following resolution was unanimously recommended to the National Council of American Cotton Manufacturers for adoption:

"Resolved, That the chairman of the National Council of American Cotton Manufacturers be empowered and is hereby directed to appoint a committee of seven representing the manufacturing, importing, and exporting of raw cotton and finished goods, which, as the representative of the National Council of American Cotton Manufacturers shall cooperate with the Department of Commerce and through the Textile Alliance, or other means, aid in regulating the exportation and importation of cotton, cotton waste, and manufactures of cotton and the preservation of our increasing export trade in cotton goods.

"After a brief discussion, the chairman, Edward Farnham Greene, appointed the following on the committee: D. Y. Cooper, Henderson, N. C.; F. E. Callaway, La Grange, Ga.; C. B. Bryant, Charlotte, N. C.; John S. Lawrence, Boston, Mass.; Albert Greene Duncan, Boston, Mass.; Randall N. Durfee, Fall River, Mass. This committee met the same afternoon and adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this committee, created this 22d day of June, 1917, by the National Council of American Cotton Manufacturers, and in cooperation with the Textile Alliance (Inc.), of which the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers and the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association are members, hereby tenders its services to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce, in connection with the control of the exportation and importation of cotton, cotton waste, and manufactures of cotton, and the preservation of our increasing export trade in cotton goods.

"This committee has held two meetings since, one in New York, June 29; one in Washington, July 10. At this last meeting, which was made by appointment with Dr. Pratt for the committee, there were informal discussions as to the need of control and the methods to be employed should the Government decide to exercise any control. A suggested plan was presented to Dr. Pratt, who agreed to lay it before the administration board of the export council for investigation, and subsequent recommendation to the council if the circumstances appeared to warrant it. The committee at this meeting also met Mr. C. A. Richards, who is at the head of the division of export licenses, Dr. Young, and Mr. E. R. Sartwell, the latter connected with the publicity department of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, who kindly consented to undertake a proper publicity campaign.

"This committee have already made arrangements, if the Government should call upon them, to put the plan submitted to Dr. Pratt in operation within three days' time. They can arrange a competent working force to handle the shipments when they arrive in foreign ports within two weeks, or practically when the ships reach their destination. The committee is now waiting to hear from Washington as to what their plans are and whether they can be of service.

"Every member of the northern or southern association present at the general or special meetings held in Washington was in favor of so controlling exports that no raw cotton or the products of cotton should reach Germany. It was distinctly agreed by everyone that whatever effect on price such control might have was not to be considered, as the country could not afford to aid the enemy in any way, no matter what the cost might be.

"Cotton is one of the most necessary, if not the most necessary, factor in the conduct of war on account of its general use as an explosive. It has been estimated that the total amount of cotton used by the allies for powder amounts to 3,000,000 bales a year, while the Teutonic needs amount to 2,500,000 bales. The above figures show what power this country has if it furnishes the allies and keeps cotton from Germany. Notwithstanding the leakages of cotton into Germany that country is beginning to feel the need of cotton. It is now making part of its explosives from wood pulp, as is evidenced by the decreased effectiveness of the artillery fire as well as by the recent purchase of 200,000 tons of wood pulp from Sweden. This is a war of artillery; give to one army explosives made from wood pulp and to the other explosives made from cotton, and the one with the cotton will win as surely as an army with guns that outrange those of the enemy will win. Unless Germany finds a way of procuring cotton, Germany will be defeated by cotton.

"Some weeks ago the Boston Transcript published an editorial urging the immediate control of cotton exports on account of the use of cotton as the basis of explosives. Commenting on this editorial, among others, a Providence father who has two sons wearing Uncle Sam's uniform writes, 'Why should our sons go forth to fight in foreign lands, many never to return again, if our Government makes no attempt to keep cotton from reaching Germany through neutral and allied countries?' A Braintree mother with three sons of military age, one already wearing the uniform, writes, 'To put it plainly, we are sending them to be killed and providing the material to kill them with.' Surely the mothers of our soldiers have the right not to ask but to demand that cotton exports shall be controlled.

"One reason which has been advanced against the control of cotton exports is that it may tend to lower prices. It seems incredible that anyone should advance such an argument when, as Senator BORAH says, America is fighting now for the preservation of her own democracy, and this fact must be unmistakably impressed upon all Americans. America must throw the whole force of her power into the conflict.

"Meetings of the farmers' union have been held in parts of Texas recently at which resolutions were passed to send telegrams to the Texas Senators at Washington demanding that cotton be taken out of the food-control bill. Cotton was taken from this bill, and the reason why these resolutions were sent to Washington was simply to keep up the price of cotton, as it was thought that the control of cotton exports meant lower prices.

"Manufacturers are asked to content themselves with a 10 per cent profit. Cotton costs not over 10 cents to raise; it sells to-day for 26 cents. If no cotton reaches Germany the price will not be affected; if cotton does reach Germany can these Texas gentlemen refuse to be satisfied with a slightly smaller profit than they now receive? We commend the following extract from the President's message to these objectors:

"The case needs no arguing. I assume that I am only expressing your own thoughts—what must be in the minds of every true man when he faces the tragedy and the solemn glory of the present war for the emancipation of mankind. I summon you to a great duty, a great privilege, a shining dignity and distinction. I shall expect every man who is not a slacker to be at my side throughout this great enterprise. In it no man can win honor who thinks of himself.

"These men, however, do not represent the general sentiment of the southern cotton planters. Every southerner with whom the writer has recently talked on this subject has stated in no equivocal terms that cotton control should be put in force at once. There are so many reasons for control any one of which seems so convincing that one can not understand why control should not have been in force long ago.

"We must know where our cotton goes and to what uses it is put. We can only know if we control its export. It is not the purpose in any way to restrict exports to our allies, but only to see that none reaches our enemies. Why should Germany be permitted to get American cotton for her war explosives and her soldiers' clothes? Apparently hundreds of millions of pounds have gone to Germany by way of neutral countries. There are exceedingly good grounds for belief that in recent months cotton has reached Germany through Italian ports. In 1914, according to the International Cotton Federation, Germany operated 11,404,944 spindles; figures recently published by the Textile Recorder, of England, show only 865,074 spindles running, or 12 out of every 13 spindles idle. If this is the case the most of Germany's cotton imports are made into explosives, as the number of spindles running would require but a small part of the amount she is credited with receiving.

"The Government must use its economic forces to assist its allies and to weaken its enemies. Cotton has always been used as the basis of powerful explosives, and if Germany is prevented from obtaining cotton it means the shortening of hostilities and the saving of untold lives.

"Cotton should be controlled by the Government so that it only goes to our friends, and our enemies should not be able to use American cotton in making the explosives that sink our ships or kill our soldiers on the field. The products of our soil must not give aid and comfort to the enemy.

"In this matter we should also consider the needs of our allies. Certainly England and France should be given the benefit of our supplies, especially as they are willing to pay the price asked. In no way can they be assured of these supplies except by export control. Both these countries are in great need of cotton. The present stock in Liverpool is only 183,000 bales. Owing to the exceedingly high prices and smallness of stock the Liverpool Exchange is practically closed. The closing of the Havre Cotton Exchange has resulted in a demand for the State control of cotton and the suppression of speculation. In July, 1914, the price of 110 pounds of cotton at Havre was approximately $16, and at Liverpool a few cents lower. In May, 1917, it was $44 at Havre, while it was $29 at Liverpool. England was thus able to undersell in France the French manufacturers despite the duty. Such conditions are not healthy; they can be very much ameliorated by a proper export control.

"The greatest cause for uneasiness as to the leakage into Germany is the size of the shipments into Italy. These shipments have been very much larger than required to operate the 4,600,000 spindles in that country. Owing to the lack of steam coal it is reported that the industries of Italy are scarcely running 50 per cent of their normal production. Cotton is shipped to Genoa and through Switzerland into Germany; these shipments are ostensibly for Swiss consumption. As Switzerland has only 1,500,000 spindles, and as the need for fuel is probably more acute in Switzerland than in any other country, it is safe to assume the spindles are not running in full. There seems reasonable grounds for presuming that private commercial agreements are in that way still in force through Swiss mediums, so that Germany is receiving considerable quantities.

"Outside of these routes a gentleman very high in the American diplomatic service in Austria has reported that he has seen quantities of American cotton in Austria. These shipments have probably not gone direct from this side. England can not blockade Italian shipping as she can the neutral countries. Italy must attend to this herself. The United States is in a position to ration cotton so that Italy only receives her own requirements and no more. In this way the leakage through Switzerland could be absolutely stopped.

"Our advance army is now in France; 500,000 men have just been drafted; 500,000 more are to be drafted in the fall. This means that everything pertaining to an army of a million men will have to be transported to France, and ships must be continually taking this army supplies. The shipping situation is already acute, and the constant destruction by the U-boats will make this situation more and more acute. It will require very good calculation to see that tonnage necessary for their subsistence is furnished. For this reason also all our exports should be controlled so that the most effective use possible be made of shipping.

"All exports will sooner or later be put into three classes; these will be known as vital, essential, and nonessential. Cotton will be considered in the essential, if not vital, class if it is for the requirements of our allies. It will be considered in the nonessential class if for neutrals, and it will be considered vital that none reaches Germany.

"If we do not control our own exports of cotton, it is quite possible that our exports may be controlled for us. Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Holland have only 1,345,000 spindles. Compare the tables of exports to these countries for 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917 with their requirements. None of these countries will guarantee that no supplies reach Germany. Some of them insist that it is the right of neutrals to buy where they please and to sell where they can find a profitable market. Sweden has just sold 200,000 tons of wood pulp for cellulose. This is to be used to fight us; England has interfered with the trade of these neutral countries with her blockade. If we refused clearances to these neutrals without guaranties, there would be no need for the blockade; as an ally it is our duty to give the English Navy this relief.

"A foreign control of our exports would be most unfortunate. It might happen that such a method would restrict trade; this we wish to avoid. Export control will not only keep cotton from the enemy but will really keep trade routes open. This will mean a broader market and better trade, which will mean higher prices than might otherwise prevail.

"While it is not the purpose in this article to take up the price of cotton sight must not be lost of the present exceedingly high price, which works great hardship in many ways. The situation has so developed in the cotton-goods market that consumers have to pay twice the value of cotton measured by any fair standard. This question does not have to do with export control, but is a question as to the control of the cotton exchanges, which are solely responsible for speculative fluctuations.

"No man is a true American who in any way assists in exporting any article whch he has reasonable grounds to think may be of service to the enemy; any man who knowingly attempts to export any such commodity which is destined for the enemy is a traitor to his country. This man may have subscribed large amounts to the liberty loan and have given liberally to the Red Cross, but he, nevertheless, stands in the same class as Benedict Arnold, and under present conditions should be treated as such.

"We are in this war because our manhood demanded it; we are fighting to make the world safe for generations to come; we must therefore use every means at our disposal to win a victory which shall be lasting and which we hope will put an end to world wars. The control of cotton exports means life or death to many of our American soldiers whom we are sending to fight our battles in Europe. Can we afford longer delay in this matter? The control can not be put in force too soon; it can not be made too stringent.

"At a recent hearing held at the statehouse in Boston before Gov. McCall a well-known woman in Massachusetts said she would freely offer her only son as a sacrifice if it were necessary. If he never came back, she would accept the sacrifice; if he came back maimed for life, she would be content, but she would never forgive the Commonwealth if that son was not protected while he was fighting for his country and came back with a poisoned body. It seems that every mother would be entitled to take the same stand if the United States Government did not at least try to control these cotton exports so that they would not reach Germany, there to be made into explosives to kill American boys. She would have reason not to forgive the country which did not protect her son.

Note that Switzerland exports small amounts of cotton waste to Germany and Austria.

"Exports of raw cotton from Switzerland, if the Swiss figures are reliable, are very small.

"The total value of such exports in 1915 was about 4,000,000 francs ($800,000).

"Recorded exports of waste to Germany and Austria-Hungary are as follows (in quintals) for first nine months of the year:

Germany, 1916	3,000
Austria-Hungary, 1916	5,000

1915	64,000

WHY CONTROL OF COTTON EXPORTS IS NEEDED.

"Official Government statistics of the exports of raw cotton to Italy and central European countries contiguous to Germany afford strong circumstantial evidence that this country has been Germany's source of cotton supply since the war started, and that substantial quantities of the fiber, as well as of waste and soft cotton yarns, are still being received by our enemy from the United States. These statistics are sufficient evidence of the need of strict Government control of cotton exports.

LANDS IN OREGON.

Mr. MCNARY. I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (S. 2784) to authorize the purchase by the city of McMinnville, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MCNARY. In connection with the bill I present certain letters, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the papers were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

McMINNVILLE, OREG., July 25, 1917.

Hon. C. L. MCNARY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The city of McMinnville, Oreg., acting through its water and light commission, has filed upon the waters of the South Fork of the North Yamhill River, known locally as Haskins Creek, for the purpose of supplying water for domestic purposes to its inhabitants.

Plans for a gravity water system and samples of water from the proposed supply have been submitted to the State board of health for approval, as provided by the Oregon law, and the State board of health has approved the project and has authorized the city of McMinnville to proceed with construction of the system at once, with the express understanding, however, that the city will immediately take steps to acquire as a reserve the land which forms the watershed of Haskins Creek above the point of diversion. Pursuant to this authority, the city has let a contract for the construction of the system. The cost of the system complete will be from $90,000 to $100,000.

Approximately fifteen hundred acres of this land is privately owned, and action will be taken at once to acquire this—by purchase if possible, by condemnation proceedings if necessary. Seventeen hundred and sixty acres is included in the Oregon & California land grant, which has now reverted to the United States.

The land situated in the Oregon & California grant is described as follows:

The north half of section 13 township 3 south, range 6 west.

The north half of the southeast quarter of section 13, township 3 south, range 6 west.

The north half of the southwest quarter of section 13, township 3 south, range 6 west.

The north half of section 14, township 3 south, range 6 west.

The southeast quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west.

The southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The north half of the northeast quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The northwest quarter of section 11, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The northeast quarter of section 10, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The north half of the southeast quarter of section 10, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The north half of the southwest quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west.
The southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6, west.
The southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 6 west.

It is desired by the citizens of McMinnville that a special act of Congress be passed granting this tract of land to the city of McMinnville as a reserve to protect its water supply.

The grant lands herein referred to are bare of merchantable timber and are practically valueless for agricultural purposes.

Immediate action with respect to these grant lands is desirable, because they will soon be thrown open to settlement, when there is sure to follow much delay and great expense before the city can acquire title.

The citizens of McMinnville ask that the Government set aside these lands as a reserve because the present water supply is inadequate and dangerous; because the Haskins Creek supply is the only adequate and safe supply available; because the Haskins Creek supply will also become dangerous if settlers are permitted to establish homesteads in the watershed; and for the further reason that the lands are of little or no value either for the timber upon them or for agricultural purposes.

We earnestly appeal to you and to the other members of the Oregon delegation in Congress to give this matter immediate consideration, and we assure you that your efforts in their behalf will be fully appreciated by all the people of this city.

Very respectfully,

J. G. BAKER,
Acting Mayor.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: the light and water commission of McMinnville has directed a communication to yourself, also to the other members of the Oregon delegation in Congress, in regard to a reserve which we would like for the Government to set aside for the benefit of the city of McMinnville's new water system. We have filed our plans with the State board of health for approval, and while they gave us authority to go ahead with the work, with the strict understanding on the part of the commission that we control the watershed above our intake on Haskins Creek, we propose to buy as much of it as possible and take the balance by condemnation, being about 1,500 acres privately owned.

What we are mostly interested in is the land included in the O. & C. land grant, now reverted back to the Government and soon to be opened to entry. There is no doubt that this land will be filed on by a certain class of people for a speculative purpose. Each member of the Oregon delegation will be furnished with a list of the Government land in this Haskins Creek watershed. We are very anxious that a special act of Congress be passed granting this tract of 1,760 acres of land to the city of McMinnville as a reserve to protect this water supply which is of the most vital importance to the city.

We will have over $90,000 invested in this new system, and as the work of construction is in progress and the contracts call for the completion of this system by December 1, 1917, immediate action is desired. I would greatly appreciate your cooperation with the light and water commission in behalf of the city of McMinnville in this matter.

Yours, very truly,

G. G. SHIRLEY.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have just read communication which the water and light commission of this city has addressed to the Oregon Senators and Representatives in Congress, and beg to add that I have full and complete information regarding the matter therein referred to, and assure you that this city is in great need of acquiring the land referred to in their communication as a reserve to protect the water system which they are installing. I sincerely trust that yourself and associates will be able to formulate a bill and pass it through Congress at once so that no delay will be occasioned this city in properly safeguarding their future water supply.

I assure you your efforts in this direction will be appreciated by the residents of this city and vicinity.

Yours, very truly,

E. C. APPERSON.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the request of the city of McMinnville to have set apart as a reserve for the protection of the watershed from which the city is now securing a supply of water for its use, will say I am familiar with the needs of the city as to such water supply, also with conditions outlined in the application made in behalf of the city for such reserve, and it is highly important to the city of McMinnville that such reserve be created, as this is the only source within the reach of the city of McMinnville from which its citizens and inhabitants can procure a sufficient supply of good, wholesome water, and I sincerely trust you will do what you can to assist the citizens of McMinnville in securing the desired reserve from the lands of the Oregon & California Railroad grant which has been restored to the Government, in order that this water supply may be protected for the purposes herein mentioned.

Assuring you that your efforts along this line will be highly appreciated by the citizens of McMinnville and hoping you will meet with success in securing the passage of such proposed legislation, I am,

Very respectfully,

R. L. CONNER.

MCMINNVILLE, OREG., July 26, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: On your trips to McMinnville while attending to your duties before the circuit court, no doubt you have been told of McMinnville's serious handicap with its water supply. The situation is this: Our present water supply is inadequate and unwholesome. The municipality through its water commission is installing an additional system which will appropriate the Haskens Creek as a supply source. The State board of health has approved the system, but makes it contingent upon us to acquire a certain acreage or reserve to keep the water from contamination.

This will require a larger amount of money than is available from the bond issue.

The water situation in McMinnville is critical. It has always been a big problem. Several attempts were made to sink deep wells, but the water was found unwholesome and unfit to drink.

I wish to say, Senator, that not an iota of selfishness is actuating the council or the commission in presenting this matter for a special act of Congress to you.

I hope that you will give the proposition the attention it deserves. To us living in McMinnville it means a great deal, for the growth of the town has been handicapped because of our inadequate water supply. At present in the summertime we must resort to pump Yamhill River water to meet the needs of the population.

May I not count on you in taking up this matter at your earliest convenience? Many of your friends and admirers are deeply interested and will be grateful for your assistance in this important matter.

Yours, very sincerely,

EDGAR MERESSE.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no intention of detaining the Senate in the discussion of the pending bill for any considerable length of time to-day. I feel, however, that if Senators will take the desk copy of the bill and follow what I have to say, the information which I shall give, and which I think the Senate ought to be in possession of, it will hasten the passage of the bill and prevent hundreds of questions being asked when the amendments to the bill come up for discussion and consideration.

It is my intention at this time to take up the bill by titles and to call the attention of the Senate to the amount of revenue which is expected to be raised under each title, and also under each bracket or paragraph or section of each of the titles of the bill. This will not occupy much of the time of Senators who are present. I shall begin with Title I, and call attention to the amount of every assessment in the bill and the amount which will be raised therefrom under the bill, based upon the war profits of 1916.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. I am very anxious to follow the statement of the Senator from Utah as closely as possible, but I have two forms of the pending bill before me. In following the Senator in his discussion of the matter, which form would he suggest that Senators use—the regular form of the bill which is before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I suggested, as the Senator from Idaho will recall, that Senators take the desk copy of the bill; that is, the regular bill form, which is Calendar No. 106.

I know it is doubted by some that the profits for the year 1917 will amount to as much as did the profits of 1916, but from all the information which the committee could secure, not only from the business interests of the country themselves but from the department, they were led to believe that the profits for 1917 will be greater than were the profits for 1916. If they are greater, Mr. President, the figures that I shall give the Senate at this time will be increased according to the percentage of the increase in those profits over those of 1916; if the profits for the year 1917 are less than those for the year 1916, whatever decreased percentage there may be must of necessity deduct from the amount of the revenue which I shall present to the Senate the same pro rata decrease. I can only express my opinion that the profits for 1917 will be greater than those for 1916, although it may be that, as a result of enforcing some of the powers which have been granted to the President, and through their administration, the profits of individuals, partnerships, and corporations in this country for the latter part of the year 1917 may be diminished. I believe, however, that the profits for 1917 will be greater than those represented by the revenues which I shall report as being based thereon.

Mr. President, taking the bill, we will begin with "Title I, war income tax." In section 1 the first tax imposed is the normal tax on individuals. You will find on line 9, page 1, that the normal tax on individuals is 2 per cent upon the income of every individual and citizen or resident of the United States which is received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter. That 2 per cent tax will raise a revenue amounting to $89,135,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Are we to understand the Senator from Utah as he goes along to include also taxes raised under prior laws?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the amounts that I shall state are in addition to the amounts already derived under existing law. Section 2 of Title I, Mr. President, imposes an additional tax upon the incomes of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter over and above the tax imposed under prior income-tax laws.

Beginning with the first bracket of that section, there is imposed an additional tax of 1 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500. From that there will be raised $4,368,440.

In passing, Mr. President, I desire to say that the present law, with the increase as provided in this paragraph, levies a rate of 3 per cent upon incomes which exceed $5,000 and do not exceed $7,500.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is, this bill levies 3 per cent, and the total will be 4 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the total will be 3 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. One per cent being the normal tax under the law as it is now, and 2 per cent under the first section of this bill, and 1 per cent additional, make 4 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of the present 2 per cent normal tax and the 1 per cent additional surtax under this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present law there is a normal tax of 2 per cent and 1 per cent in the first bracket of this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me see if I understand the Senator. As I understand, a person having an income of $7,500 will pay after this proposed law is passed what is equivalent to 4 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. No; 3 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, he pays 1 per cent under the law as it is now?

Mr. SMOOT. He will pay 1 per cent surtax under this bill, and under the present law he pays a normal tax of 2 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, he now pays 2 per cent, and he will pay 2 per cent more under section 1 of this bill. That makes 4 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I am trying to get at is the total amount of the tax that a person will pay, whether it be called a normal or subnormal or war tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I will make the statement so that all Senators may follow it. The normal tax, as I stated, is 2 per cent, and this bill imposes an additional tax of 1 per cent, which will make the entire tax 3 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to suggest to the Senator from the State of Washington that in the report of the committee, on page 3, is a table giving the present tax and the additional tax figured out according to various incomes of individuals.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the amount of the tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amount of the tax, as well as the per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is what I want to get at——

Mr. SMOOT. I think the figures referred to by the Senator from New Mexico relate to the total of the title, not the revenue from each individual bracket.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is upon various amounts of income figured out.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What I wanted to get at was the total amount of the tax under this bracket and under existing law that a man with an income of $7,500 would have to pay. Under existing law, how much does he have to pay?

Mr. SMOOT. Under existing law he pays 2 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And under section 1 of this bill he pays 2 per cent more; that makes 4 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present law, however, I will say, he does not pay any surtax on account of an exemption on all incomes under $20,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will leave out the question of exemption.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why I say his tax would only be 3 per cent a year. Under the pending bill all that he would pay would be 3 per cent, as I have said, because of the fact that he is exempted from a surtax under the present law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us leave out the question of exemption. I want to get at the rate.

Mr. SMOOT. Three per cent will be the rate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Three per cent is the rate now?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the present rate is but 2 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Two per cent under the first bracket imposing an increased tax on graduated incomes. He would have to pay 2 per cent additional under section 1, would he not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That makes 4 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not make 4 per cent, because he has an exemption under present law of the normal tax of 2 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator does not understand what I am trying to get at, and I will not bother him any further.

Mr. SMOOT. No bother. I have told the Senator that under the present law and the pending bill, if it becomes a law, a person receiving an income of $5,000 to $7,500 will pay a tax of 3 per cent.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator from Utah is so familiar with these figures that I am quite sure he is able to make it very clear to anyone exactly what the tax will be under this bill. In speaking of the normal tax I suggest that the Senator state exactly what the normal tax is. As I understand, it is 4 per cent. While this matter seems very easy to the Senator from Utah and to other Senators who have been in touch with it, the question has been asked me by at least a dozen different people exactly in the same form as asked by the Senator from Washington. If we place the minimum normal tax at 4 per cent, as it is under the pending bill, it will clarify the whole situation and perhaps tend to make more understandable the able argument of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. What I desire to call to the attention of the Senate is the percentage of increase under each one of these brackets over the present law and the revenue which each will yield. Under the second bracket, levying a tax of "2 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000," the amount of revenue will yield $5,683,440 and the increase of the tax over the present law will be 4 per cent. Under the next bracket, levying a tax of "3 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500," the revenue derived will be $5,987,420. Under the next bracket, levying a tax of "4 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000," the revenue derived will be $6,253,170. Under the bracket levying a tax of "6 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $20,000" there will be derived in revenue $13,944,740. Under the next bracket, levying a tax of "8 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $40,000," there will be derived $34,352,640. Under the bracket levying a tax of "10 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000" there will be derived $20,334,300. Under the bracket levying a tax of "12 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $80,000" there will be derived $15,205,680. Under the bracket levying a tax of "16 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000" there will be derived $13,896,290 of revenue. Under the bracket levying a tax of "20 per cent upon the amount per annum by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000" there will be derived in revenue $28,856,100. Under the bracket levying a tax of "23 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000" there will be derived $18,404,710. The bracket levying a tax of "26 per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000" will yield $14,152,320. The bracket levying a tax of "29 per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000" will yield a revenue of $12,049,070. The bracket levying a tax of "31 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000" will yield a revenue of $28,761,180. The bracket levying a tax of "33 per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000" will yield $106,379,450.

Mr. President, perhaps it would be well enough at this time to summarize the amounts to be collected under the title. It is as follows—and this is in addition to the present law: The normal 2 per cent tax will yield $89,134,500, the surtax $328,629,000, and the corporation 4 per cent tax, as found in section 4 of the bill, $360,000,000 making a total under Title I of $770,763,500.

The next title, Title II, has reference to the war-profits tax.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator give the last figures again—the total?

Mr. SMOOT. Seven hundred and seventy-seven million seven hundred and sixty-three thousand five hundred dollars.

Title II relates to the war-profits tax. Senators will notice that it is based upon the prewar years of 1911, 1912, and 1913, and there is a graduated tax upon the percentage of profits over and above the profit of the prewar years.

On page 12, the first bracket is:

> Twelve per cent of the amount of such war profits not in excess of 15 per cent of the deduction allowed by section 203, section 204, or section 205, as the case may be, * * * being the difference between the net income and the war profits as there determined.

The amount of revenue received from that bracket will be $88,000,000.

Under the 16 per cent bracket there will be collected $38,000,000.

Under the 20 per cent bracket there will be collected $83,000,000.

Under the 25 per cent bracket, $71,000,000.

Under the 30 per cent bracket, $55,000,000.

Under the 35 per cent bracket, $85,000,000.

Under the 40 per cent bracket, $66,000,000.

Under the 45 per cent bracket, $48,000,000.

Under the 50 per cent bracket, $254,000,000.

The amounts I have just named, however, include the tax imposed under the existing law. The total of the amounts that I have just named is $788,000,000. Deducting from that the amount collected under the present law of $226,000,000, it leaves an additional tax under Title II of the bill of $562,000,000.

Perhaps I had better return now to Title I and tell the Senate what the House bill under that title would have raised by way of revenue.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator state whether the estimates he has just given are based on the returns for last year?

Mr. SMOOT. The returns for 1916; yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Without attempting to prophesy how the returns this year will compare with those?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right. I made that statement in my opening remarks.

The revenue under the House bill under Title I, income tax, for the year 1917, would be $596,700,000. The House bill also provided for a retroactive income tax for 1916 amounting to $108,000,000, or a total with the retroactive tax of $704,700,000, as against $777,763,500 under the Senate bill.

Under Title II, the war-profits tax, the Senate bill will yield a revenue of $562,000,000. Under the House bill it would have yielded but $200,000,000.

I am not going to discuss the details of each of these titles at this time, and the reasons for making the changes in the House bill. I shall do that at some later date.

Title III is the war tax on beverages.

Section 300. Tax on distilled spirits in bond will amount to $135,000,000.

The tax imposed in section 304—

> upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day this act is enacted, are held by a retailer in a quantity in excess of 50 gallons in the aggregate, or by any other person, corporation, partnership, or association in any quantity—will amount to $54,500,000.

Section 305 is what is commonly known as the rectifiers' tax. From it we will receive $5,000,000. I call attention to the fact that there is quite a reduction in the rectifiers' tax in the Senate bill as compared with the House bill, because the Senate has stricken out the word "wine" and inserted the word "proof," and only imposes the tax upon the proof-gallon instead of the wine-gallon.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator state what the difference is?

Mr. SMOOT. Generally there are 2½ wine-gallons made out of 1 proof-gallon; or in other words, instead of 15 cents, as provided for in the House bill, it is virtually a 6-cent tax. That is the substance of the Senate amendment.

On page 32, in section 308, a tax is imposed upon fermented liquors and beers, ales, porters, and so forth. From that section we will receive a revenue of $46,000,000.

In section 310, a tax is imposed upon still wines, including vermuth, liqueurs, cordials, and so forth. The revenue upon sweet wines will be $4,600,000, and upon liqueurs and cordials, about $200,000.

On page 35, beginning with subdivision "(a)," referring to dry wines, under that subdivision the revenue will be $1,600,000.

Under subsection "(c)," the tax upon champagnes, sparkling wines, and artificially carbonated wines, the revenues will be $9,600,000.

Under section 312 a tax is imposed upon all grape brandy or wine spirits withdrawn by a producer of wines from any fruit distillery or special bonded warehouse under subdivision (c) of section 402 of the act of September 8, 1916. The revenue produced by that section will be $5,000,000.

Under section 313, at the bottom of page 36, there will be collected $1,000,000.

Under section 314, subdivision "(a)," on page 37, the revenue will be $3,000,000; and under subsection "(b)," at the bottom of the page, $2,000,000.

From all natural mineral waters or table waters sold by the producer, bottler, and so forth, under subsection "(c)," page 38, the revenue will be $1,000,000.

Under section 316, at the bottom of page 38, on all carbonic-acid gas in drums or other containers, the revenue will be $5,000,000.

Under Title III, under the Senate bill there will be collected in revenue $218,000,000. Under the House bill under the same title there would have been collected $171,000,000.

Title IV has reference to the war tax on cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof, beginning on page 39 of the bill.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRADY. Before leaving the section the Senator is discussing at this time, I wish to make some inquiry about an amendment that the Senator from Utah offered relative to the taking over of distilled liquors during the consideration of the food-control bill in the Senate. I voted for an amendment offered by the Senator from Utah on that subject. That was not given consideration in the present measure, was it?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that it is not in this bill. The Senate virtually passed upon that question when the food bill was before the Senate; and as far as I was personally concerned, as a member of the Finance Committee, I did not desire to press a matter that had just been passed upon by the Senate in a bill that had just been signed by the President covering the same subject matter. When we reach this title for amendment, I shall have something to say about the details of the title.

Mr. BRADY. I was very heartily in favor of the Senator's amendment, and I thought I would find out what the history of it was.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that a number of the States have recently passed under prohibitory statutes, and in view of the uncertainty as to the operation of those statutes and the amount of intoxicating liquors which will be consumed during the calendar year 1917, was it possible for the committee and is it possible for my colleague to reach any definite conclusions as to what revenue will be raised under the title to which he has just referred?

Mr. SMOOT. I thank my colleague for calling my attention to the matter. I will state that in all of these estimated revenues there has been taken into consideration the decreased consumption that will follow the imposition of a greater tax, and also the fact that a number of the States have gone dry, many of them "bone dry," since last year. I will say that if the estimate had been based upon the amount that was consumed for the year 1916 at the rates imposed, the estimates would have been a great deal higher than those I have just given.

Mr. KING. Then the bill assumes that we will drink less intoxicating liquors this year than we did last year?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the estimated revenues, as given, assume that.

Continuing, Mr. President, Title IV refers to the war tax on cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof.

Section 400, the first section of that title, has reference to cigars. The revenue collected will be $10,000,000 on cigars and $20,000,000 on cigarettes, making $30,000,000 for the section.

Under section 401 there will be collected upon tobacco $25,000,000, and upon snuff $1,500,000.

Under section 403, page 42, commonly known as the floor-tax section, from tobacco and snuff there will be collected $750,000; from cigars, $200,000; and from cigarettes, $150,000. From cigarette papers, under section 404, there will be collected $100,000.

Under that title, as a whole, the Senate bill provides for a revenue of $56,600,000. The House bill under the same title was estimated to yield $68,200,000.

Title V is the war tax on facilities furnished by public utilities.

Section 500, at the bottom of page 43, provides a tax of 3 per cent on the amount paid for the transportation by rail or water or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water, which will yield a revenue of $77,500,000.

On page 44 there is a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents, or fraction thereof, paid to any person, corporation, partnership, or association engaged in the business of transporting parcels or packages by express, which will yield $9,000,000.

I call attention here, Mr. President, to the fact that the Senate has imposed a tax upon all parcels sent by parcels post. It is provided for in the bill on page 71, and I will refer to it hereafter.

Under the tax of 5 per cent on the amount paid for the transportation of persons by rail or water the revenue will be $37,500,000; and under the same section, with relation to season tickets, at the bottom of the page, a revenue will be received of $2,250,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KING. In view of the fact that the railroad corporations of the United States are making serious complaint because of the fact that their incomes are not sufficient to permit the improvements required, because they are not able to meet the demands for increased transportation, and in view of the fact that they are constantly making appeals, possibly with some justice, for increased freight rates, I will ask the Senator whether the committee felt that it was wise, in view of the enormous demands that are now being made upon the transportation companies, to impose upon them, in addition to the profits tax, a tax for carrying freight?

Mr. SMOOT. This is not a tax upon railroads. It falls upon the shippers and upon persons traveling upon the railroads. The committee sympathizes with the position just stated by my colleague. I think the committee will be criticized before the bill passes for making an exception in one or two cases for the railroads. I think we will hear a good deal from some Senators as to how we have yielded to that wonderful monopolistic power. However, there is no question, Mr. President, but that the railroads are at the present time put to their wits' end to meet the present situation, and there is no question but that every encouragement should be given to them in order that they may provide transportation facilities to handle the business of the country. To-day it is impossible for them to do it, and, as far as I am concerned, I would not add an unnecessary burden to them. In this connection——

Mr. LODGE. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator has pointed out, in reply to the inquiry of his colleague, that we changed it from a 6 per cent tax on gross sales and reduced the amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that. I was going to mention it. Perhaps it will be just as well for me at this point to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the taxes imposed by this bill as reported to the Senate will yield $2,010,000,000 in revenue, and from four sources there will be collected $1,614,363,500. Those sources are incomes, war profits, liquors, and tobacco, leaving less than $400,000,000 that will be a direct tax upon what we commonly call the consumer.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the Senator if the amount given by him to be raised by this measure on four articles is in addition to taxes which are already raised on the same articles under existing law?

Mr. SMOOT. It is in addition to taxes already imposed. These will be additional taxes, and I might say that the $2,010,000,000 is all additional tax over and above the present law.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, he no doubt has the amount that will be raised by the present law and the additional taxes from those four sources?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. It is, in round numbers, $2,582,000,000 from those four sources; that is, out of the total tax of $3,300,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Now, Mr. President, on page 45 there is imposed 5 per cent upon the amount paid for transportation of oil by pipe line. The revenue from that source will be $4,500,000.

On the same page there is a tax imposed of 5 cents upon each telegram, telephone, or radio dispatch. The revenue will amount to $7,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just referred to the tax which is placed upon the transportation of oil by pipe line. May I ask whether the committee went into the question of the transportation of natural gas by pipe line, and if so, what revenue might be raised in that behalf?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there was no discussion of the matter before the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not the Senator think attention should have been given to the natural gas in the West Virginia fields and in the Ohio fields?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if they are not largely local and within the State, or do they enter into interstate commerce to any extent?

Mr. POMERENE. The gas from the West Virginia fields goes into Ohio very largely, and the gas companies seek to keep it out of interstate commerce by delivering it to the middle line of the Ohio River by one company and selling it to another company incorporated in Ohio. Ohio gas goes up into Michigan.

Mr. SMOOT. There is nothing in the bill covering that.

Mr. POMERENE. With all due respect, I think the Senate committee might have found a little revenue there.

Mr. SMOOT. In justification of the committee I wish to say that this bill is just the beginning of taxation, and the American people might just as well know it now as later. The Finance Committee thought at this time the best thing to do was to confine it to as few sources as possible. I have no doubt but that the gas pipe line will be taxed, as nearly nearly everything else in this country must be taxed before we can pay what is absolutely necessary to carry on the world war now in progress.

Mr. POMERENE. I may say to the Senator, if I may be permitted, that nearly all these natural-gas companies doing business in West Virginia and Ohio are subsidiary companies of the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. SMOOT. Under Title V, from the tax on facilities furnished by public utilities under the Senate committee bill there will be collected $137,750,000. On page 71 of the bill there is $9,000,000 to be collected from parcel post. That should come under this title, making for this title $146,750,000 under the Senate committee bill. Under the House bill there was an estimated revenue of $214,750,000. When the bill is up for discussion in detail I shall call the attention of the Senate to the items that the Senate committee has stricken out, making the revenue less under the Senate committee bill than that provided for in the House, and I do not believe there is a Senator who will not agree that the action taken by the committee was absolutely right and just.

Under Title VI, war excise taxes, page 51, is the tax imposed upon automobiles, and from the tax as provided for in the Senate committee bill there will be a revenue of $40,000,000.

Under subsection (b), page 53, there is a tax upon pleasure boats, power boats, and sailing boats, and the revenue is $500,000.

In section 601, at the bottom of page 53, there is imposed a tax on tennis rackets, golf clubs, baseball bats, pool tables, and so forth, from which a revenue will be received of $800,000.

On page 54 there is a tax of 2 per cent upon perfumes, essences, extracts, toilet waters, cosmetics, and so forth, yielding a revenue of $1,900,000.

On page 55, 2 per cent upon what I may call all proprietary medicines will yield a revenue of $3,400,000, and upon all cameras sold by the manufacturers a revenue of $500,000.

Under the Senate committee bill, from Title VI there will be a revenue of $47,100,000. Under the House bill the revenue yielded would be $117,700,000, considerably more under the House bill than under the Senate committee bill.

In Title VII, "war tax on admissions," page 57, there is a tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission to any place, including admission by season tickets or subscriptions, the revenue from which will amount to $21,000,000.

Under subsection (c) on the same page a tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof paid for admission to any public performance for profit at any cabaret or other similar entertainment will yield a revenue of $1,000,000.

Under subsection (d) at the bottom of the page, on theater tickets $1,000,000.

The total collected under the Senate committee bill in Title VII on war tax on admissions will amount to $23,000,000; under the House bill to $62,500,000.

The next is Title VIII, "war-stamp taxes." If you turn to page 70, under Schedule A, you will find the first tax imposed under that title is upon bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued on or before the first day the Senate may decide after the bill becomes a law. The revenue will be $4,000,000.

On page 71, parcel-post packages, that I have referred to before, the revenue is $9,000,000.

Upon the issue of capital stock there is a tax imposed of 5 cents on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, which will yield a revenue of $3,000,000.

On page 72, upon sales of stock or upon transfers of stock, the revenue will amount to $5,000,000.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the Senator how does the revenue under Schedule A in the first item, for example, compare with the present law?

Mr. SMOOT. This is a stamp tax, and there is no law to-day on the subject. I will say to the Senator that all the stamp taxes were repealed.

Mr. STERLING. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 74 the tax upon the sale of produce on exchanges will yield a revenue of $2,300,000.

On page 76 there is a tax imposed upon drafts or checks payable otherwise than at sight or on demand, promissory notes, except bank notes issued for circulation, a rate of 2 cents on every hundred dollars, which will yield $600,000.

Then, following that, is a tax imposed upon bank checks, drafts, or certificates of deposit not drawing interest of 1 cent upon each check or draft, as the case may be, which will yield a revenue of $10,000,000.

Next, upon conveyances, such as deeds, instruments, or writing whereby any lands, tenements, and so forth, are transferred, the revenue will be $5,000,000.

Upon the entry of goods, wares, and merchandise at any of our customhouses, 25 cents on each $100 in value, the revenue will be $150,000.

Each entry for withdrawal of any goods or merchandise from customs, bonded warehouse, page 77, the revenue will be $150,000.

On passage tickets, $100,000.

On proxies, $100,000.

On powers of attorney, $100,000.

On playing cards, $1,500,000.

The total collected under Title VIII under the Senate committee bill will be $32,000,000; under the House bill it was estimated at $33,000,000.

Title IX of the House bill refers to the war estate tax. The Senate committee in its judgment thought it was very unwise to impose further additional taxes upon inheritances, and therefore struck that section out of the bill. Of course, I am not going to take the time now to state the reasons why, but I have no doubt the Senate will agree, when the reasons are pointed out, that the action of the Committee on Finance was the proper one to take.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator state the amount proposed to be raised under the House bill by that tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the House provision the estate tax would be $6,000,000, and under the House's unscientific imposition of a tariff duty the revenue would have been $200,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state how much is derived from the estate tax now, or about how much?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not positive, and I do not want to make a statement unless I know. The figures have slipped my mind.

Under Title IX of the Senate committee bill, as the bill is reported to the Senate, on page 85 it refers to the war excise tax on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar. Upon coffee or substitutes therefor there is a tax imposed of 2 cents a pound, which will yield a revenue of $20,000,000. Upon all tea produced or imported there is a tax imposed of 5 cents a pound, the revenue from which will be $5,000,000. Upon all crude cocoa produced or imported the revenue will be $7,000,000. Upon all refined sugar, domestic or imported, the revenue will be $52,000,000. Upon all saccharine or similar products the revenue will be $500,000; upon glucose, $1,500,000; and upon molasses, $500,000.

On page 87 a floor tax upon these items is imposed. I will say that it was the intention of the committee when they first considered the bill not to impose a floor tax upon these items, but it developed that in particular cases, especially that of coffee, it had been distributed to the retailers all over the United States, and in many cases in quantities so great that the stock they were carrying would be all that they would require for longer than the next 12 months. The only way we could tax that stock was by the imposition of a floor tax, and that we have followed as in imposing it upon all other classes of merchandise. This floor tax would amount on coffee and substitutes therefor to $5,000,000, on tea $1,000,000, on sugar $5,000,000, on glucose $250,000, on molasses and sirups $450,000, and on cocoa $1,000,000.

Under the Senate bill Title IX will yield a revenue of $80,000,000; under the House bill on these articles there was no tax imposed, but there was a tax of 10 per cent, a horizontal increase, upon all goods imported into the United States, whether free or dutiable. That would have been a tax upon coffee, upon tea, upon sugar, upon glucose, upon saccharine—upon all the items under this title.

Mr. President, on page 88, section 902, the Senate Finance Committee voted to repeal what is commonly called the drawback provision as affecting sugar. I think it was a most unfortunate action to take. As I have stated, I am not going into the discussion of that at this time, but I think I shall be able to show to the Senate that the action of the committee in adopting this amendment and reporting it to the Senate has already produced an increase of over one-half a cent a pound in the price of the world's sugar, which has affected every table in the United States. I shall, however, leave that matter to further discussion when this section of the bill is reached.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to make sure as to this and to get it into concrete form. Does the Senator believe that the drawback on sugar should not be further permitted?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe, Mr. President, that it ought to be permitted. It has been the policy of this Government for over a hundred years, and the effect of the repeal of the drawback provision of the present law will be that a large part of the sugar now refined in this country, I may say in transit—because that is exactly what it is—will be refined in other countries, and every ounce of it would be refined by them if they had the refining plants with which to do the work. England and Canada and France, since the action of the Senate committee, are providing as fast as is possible to prepare for the refining of sugar which during the last year and the year before has been refined by the refineries in our own country; and the refining of 700,000 tons of sugar for export has cheapened the refining cost of sugar to the United States, and whatever result has come from that has gone directly to the benefit of the consumers of sugar in the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Was not the purpose of the drawback originally to encourage the exportation of sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. The idea of the drawback not only as to sugar but as to all other articles was this: Under the tariff laws of our country we were compelled to pay duties upon the articles which go into the manufacture of goods in the United States. It was impossible for us to compete with foreign countries if we were compelled to pay that tariff. So the drawback provision was adopted, providing that the articles which were required for manufacturing purposes in the United States should have the privilege of coming in, the duty being paid, and when they were exported all of the duty should be refunded to the manufacturer less 1 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that, if the Senator please, but the drawback was provided, as the Senator says, for the express purpose of enabling our manufacturers to compete with the foreign manufacturers. To that extent it must encourage the export of articles manufactured in our country; but now we come to a peculiar condition here as affecting sugar. Foreign countries are looking to this country for their refined sugar; but if the effect before was to encourage and increase sales abroad, if we should take off that drawback during the period of the war, it must follow that it would, to a certain extent, discourage the exportation of sugar; and why would not that increase to a corresponding extent the supply for domestic consumption and thereby reduce the price to our American people?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the world requires all the sugar which is now produced. It is quite a problem to produce enough sugar in the world to furnish the demands of the world. I might as well say to the Senator here that in the last year there was refined in the United States for England and France and other foreign countries 700,000 tons of sugar. This year it was expected we would refine a million tons of sugar. England and France do not ultimately pay the American duty upon the sugar, because it is first paid and then refunded; but with the drawback repealed, every pound of sugar that comes into the United States will have to pay the present duty of 1 cent a pound. If England and our other allies are forced to have their sugar refined in the United States on account of the lack of facilities on their part for refining sugar—and in the past they have been buying beet sugar from Germany, Russia, Austria, and France, and now all the sugar that they get they have to get from Java and other sources, all of which is cane sugar and, therefore, must be refined—if this bill becomes a law, and the drawback provision of the present law is repealed, every pound of sugar refined in America and exported will not only cost our allies the 1 cent tax which is paid to the Government of the United States upon its entry, but it will also cost them a half-cent consumption tax provided for in the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. It seems to me the Senator from Utah has raised a very interesting point. As I understand, all articles brought into this country and then exported are permitted a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty which they pay?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is to encourage manufacturing in this country. Since none of the goods that are exported remain in the country, there is no reason why the tax should not be refunded less the administration cost?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. HOLLIS. Now, has anyone suggested any reason why sugar should be treated differently from anything else, for instance, say, silk brought into this country, or anything of that sort? Is there any real reason why there should be any difference?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that a reason has been suggested, and those making the suggestion are very frank in saying that so long as England and France are in the position where they are compelled to have a part of their sugar refined in America we might just as well make them pay the extra cent and a half per pound imposed by our present tariff and consumption provided for in the bill.

Not only that, but there is a further reason, I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire, and it is that if we repeal the drawback provision and by so doing advance the price of the sugar of the world half a cent a pound, the Louisiana sugar planter will get a half cent more per pound for his sugar. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HOLLIS. Why will not the growers of beet sugar also receive that advance?

Mr. SMOOT. They will receive it; but, as a representative of a State which produces much of the beet sugar of this country, I desire to say that I do not approve of such a course, and I do not want to impose such an unjust burden upon our allies at this time when they are struggling with all the force they have to raise the money with which to fight this war.

Mr. HOLLIS. It seems to me the argument of the Senator from Utah is irresistible; and I want to inquire if he is at liberty to oppose the majority report of the committee on this point?

Mr. SMOOT. I reserved that right. Not only that, but I am going to say to the Senator that there was only one vote majority for this proposition.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very much interested in what the Senator has stated, and I have some knowledge of the subject matter myself, obtained, as the Senator knows, after a long investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I know the Senator is very familiar with the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to express my hearty concurrence with what the Senator is saying. There can not but one of two things happen: Either the Senator is right, and the sugar will be continued to be refined in this country, and England, France, and the other countries engaged with us in the common undertaking of fighting Germany will be held up—that is the effect of it—or the manufacture of the sugar will be quickly sent somewhere else. Under either contingency it is absolutely wrong, in my judgment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, nobody can answer the argument. I desire to say that last year—and I have just received the figures this morning—up to the 1st day of July England had purchased from Cuba 718,073 tons of sugar—I am speaking now of the calendar year—while up to July 1 of this year she has purchased 934,383 tons. This provision in this bill had not become public five days until Canada began the extra purchase of Cuban sugar, and all of her refineries will be put upon longer working hours. She has built and is just putting in operation one of the largest refineries in the world.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator state whether there is anything peculiar to the refining of sugar which renders the United States better able to refine it than England or France? Why are we able to do it more cheaply now than they can?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when England was in the market before the war, her policy had always been to buy sugar just as cheaply as she could wherever it could be found in the world. She used to buy a great deal of German sugar and Russian sugar and sugar from France and Austria.

Mr. HOLLIS. All of that was beet sugar, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. All of that was beet sugar. So when the war came on she found herself cut off from her sugar market, and she found herself without a sufficient refining capacity to take care of the quantity of sugar she required for reasons I have stated. Of course, immediately she had to turn to some place where sugar could be refined for her, and America had one-third more refining capacity than required to refine the sugar consumed by her own people; in fact, there are sugar refineries running to-day which have been out of commission and have not refined a pound of sugar for the last 10 years, until the war broke out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator has covered one phase of the question. Of course, if England can not get sugar refined in Canada or at home or elsewhere, she will buy, will she not, washed sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I was just coming to that. I do not know to what extent that will be the case; but this I know that the direct purchases which England is making to-day indicate without a question of doubt that she either has found some way to refine her sugar or she is going to use washed sugar.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator and to the Senate one other troublesome phase of this question. A considerable supply of England's cane sugar before the war, as the Senator knows, came from Java. Now the freight rates are so high and shipping is so scarce that they can get hardly any sugar from Java, and sugar in Java to-day is not worth one-fourth what it is here or in England, because they can not get that sugar to the markets of the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Transportation is practically impossible.

Mr. HARDWICK. Transportation is practically impossible.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the situation.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me once more, I do not think the subject could be handled at any better time than right now, and I am very much interested in it. As I understand the Senator, he did not conclude, I think, what he started to say. The fact is we have large facilities in this country which they have not in England and France, and it takes some time to prepare them.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Therefore we are in the field ready to refine the sugar, while it would be a large expense to England and France to erect sugar refineries to do the work.

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely correct; and not only that, but I desire to say to the Senator that if a cent and a half a pound additional charge is imposed upon England and our allies they can well afford to erect just as quickly as possible refineries sufficient to handle all the sugar their people require, and they are going to do it if this provision is adopted.

Mr. President, I am going now to leave this branch of the subject, but before doing so I desire to say that I hope with all my heart that the Senate of the United States will not agree to the amendment reported by the committee. I have no love for the sugar refiners. I remember in the year 1911, when there was a shortage of sugar in all the world and when the beet sugar of this country was all consumed and off the market, the refiners raised the price of sugar to $7.75 and held it there until the beet sugar entered the American market, and just as soon as it did, of course, the price of sugar fell about 2 cents a pound.

So I am not pleading for the sugar refiners; I am pleading for a wise principle that has been adopted and practiced by the United States for over a century.

Referring again to the bill, Mr. President, under Title X, "Administrative provisions," only $20,000 will be collected by way of revenue, and that has reference to the products of the Virgin Islands. The House had no provision like it in the bill passed by it.

On page 94 is found Title XI, which relates to postal rates and a war tax upon the profits of publication. In section 1100 there is imposed 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof in addition to the rate under the present law on first-class mail matter. This is estimated to yield a revenue of $50,000,000. Postal cards are excepted from the operation of the section.

On page 96, in section 1101, there is provided an increase of a quarter of a cent per pound or fraction thereof on second-class mail matter. This will yield a revenue of $3,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I understand the tax under section 1100 will produce an additional revenue of $50,000,000. I understand that the Government now obtains from that source at least $100,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. About $100,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is well known, of course, that this service pays for itself. The carrying of letters through the mails first-class is a very profitable business as it is, and now it is proposed to secure $50,000,000 more from that source. Will the Senator point out how this compares with the next section, which provides for a very small increase in the tax on second-class matter? As I understand, second-class matter now costs the Government something like $80,000,000, and will cost the Government something like $77,000,000 after the increase in the rate of one-fourth of 1 cent, as provided in this bill. Does not the Senator think that we ought to raise more revenue out of the second-class matter and less revenue out of the first-class matter?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator is absolutely correct so far as the revenues under the present law are concerned not only upon the first-class but upon the second-class mail matter. I recognize the fact that this title is going to cause, perhaps, days of discussion, and at this time I am going to ask the Senator to excuse me from going into the discussion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit, however, that there is room for discussion and there is room for difference of opinion as to the best way of handling this question of postal rates. I expect to speak at length upon this question when we reach this title.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to make this suggestion to the Senator: I have heard him state that he was not going to go fully into the discussion of this particular subject now, but it interests me a good deal.

Recently I was waited upon by the general manager of one of these newspaper associations, who suggested to me that the Government of the United States ought to deal with the publishers on a purely business basis, and that, if they were dealt with on that basis, the Government must distinguish between advertising and news and pay them for all the advertising of the sale of liberty bonds. Naturally it occurred to me to suggest to him that if the Government was to look at the subject upon a business basis it might be well for the publishers to take a view of the other side of the proposition, and if this were done the publishers ought to pay a substantial portion of what it costs the Government to carry the newspapers and the magazines.

It costs the Government in the neighborhood of $70,000,000 more than the Government receives to carry the newspapers and magazines. We are now carrying this printed matter at 1 cent a pound, and we add a quarter of a cent to it in this bill. It costs the Government about 8 cents per pound.

I notice on the last page of the report of the committee on this revenue bill that they expect to get by the excise tax on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar $86,000,000. In other words, we give to the publishers nearly the entire amount of the tax that we raise from sugar, tea, coffee, and cocoa.

I confess that I do not see any justice in it. I would infinitely rather that we charge these publications the full cost of the service we give them and then direct the Secretary of the Treasury each year to give them a check for the amount that we are now giving to them by the present indirect method of charging the publishers about one-eighth of what it costs the Government for the postal service they enjoy. It would at least have the merit of doing our business upon a business basis.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that I am fully aware that there is a propaganda, and a well-organized one and a very active one, working with a view of securing from the Government payment for advertisements and all matter referring to Government affairs outside of the editorial columns. I do not know how far that will get, but I do not think it will have any effect upon this bill, and I do not think we are going to make any appropriations at this session of Congress to meet that extra expense.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me to make this statement, I think it is fair to say that there is quite a difference in the cost of carrying newspapers through the mail and the cost of carrying other second-class mail matter. The cost of carrying newspapers is very largely borne by the newspapers under the present law.

I think it is fair to make that statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that this is a very serious question; and without a Senator having gone into it very fully, and listened to all sides of the question, it would be almost impossible for him to arrive at a conclusion that could be called a just one. For years and years the Government has followed a policy of encouraging the distribution of information. Second-class mail matter never has paid its way. We have discussed it on the floor of the Senate for the last 15 years, to my knowledge. Suggestions have been made of changes in the law, but it never has been changed; and I now state without question of doubt in my mind, and I know it to be a fact, that if we even double the present rate on second-class mail matter there are classes of publications in the United States that will be absolutely destroyed and driven out of business. Let me tell the Senator what class of publications I refer to. When I speak upon this subject I am going to bring the statements of some of the leading papers—statements sworn to—taken from their annual reports to their stockholders, showing that the imposition of an additional cent upon second-class mail matter would not only take all of their profits but would place them in a position of bankruptcy. The classes of publications to which I have reference are particularly the farm and religious papers of the country. We have encouraged their circulation in the past, and I think if we are going to change the imposition of taxes on second-class mail matter we ought to take it up in a bill by itself and give the publishers notice in advance that the present law and practice is to be changed. I have come to the conclusion that the only way in which it can be changed is by a gradual change, and not one so severe that it would ruin the business of the above classes of publications.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that anybody has suggested ruining their business.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I am simply saying what the effect of the increase would be, and I know it to be a fact.

Mr. POMERENE. I know that there are some publishers in this country who are patriotic enough to insist that they shall be compelled to pay at least a fair portion of this expense. They want it done, and, as patriots, they are not able to justify the present law.

Now, I want to take exception to one thing the Senator has said on this subject. The Senator has suggested that due notice ought to be served upon these people, and they ought to be given an opportunity to present their side of the matter. Why, I have a very clear recollection of the discussions that have taken place in the Senate during the more than six years I have been here. There has been hardly a year when this matter has not been fully debated, and each year these pensioners on the Government's bounty have insisted that there should be another hearing. That is always the way with any class of men who are receiving a bounty from the Government. Before it is taken away they want a discussion. They know that in that way, if they can defer it, they will continue to enjoy their bounty for a longer time.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator says is absolutely true and has reference to the publishers themselves. My suggestion had reference to the action of the Senate, not what the publishers wanted. The publishers so far have been successful in defeating an increase in rates on second-class mail matter. They have asked for hearings and they have been granted time and time again. I do not know what it has cost the Government to make the investigations in the past, but the reports have been made, and I doubt very much whether they have ever been read by one-tenth of the Senators, and I doubt very much whether the country knows what they contain. My suggestion now is that Congress take action and that Congress give notice and that Congress state that there shall be time given, and notify the publishers in advance as to what the Congress intends to do upon this most important question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am quite sure I am not mistaken in this statement: I am not a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, but I am quite sure that they have had this very matter up before that committee time and time again, and I remember some very full discussions on that subject on the floor of the Senate; and my belief is that if there is any one subject connected with taxation in this country with which the Senate generally is familiar it is this one very question of postal rates.

Mr. SMOOT. And yet the Senator must admit that we have not acted.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I realize that; and I think we all know why.

Mr. SMOOT. I could guess, I think.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and I think the Senator and I would agree.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under Title XI of the Senate bill the revenue amounts to $60,500,000. Under the House bill for that same title the revenue would be $89,000,000.

To summarize the amounts to be collected as I have stated, I will state that the total collections under the Senate bill will be $2,009,733,500. Under the House bill it would be $1,866,870,000.

Mr. President, I rose to occupy about a half hour and I have now been on the floor nearly two hours. I did intend to refer briefly to the eliminations that had been made by the Senate committee and to state briefly what they were. It will take but a moment of time, as I am not going into the details as to what amount of revenue would come from them or why the Committee on Finance eliminated them from the bill.

The first was section 5, the retroactive tax, which imposed an income tax, as provided in the House bill, upon incomes received for the year 1916. A retroactive tax in any form, Mr. President, is distasteful, and not only is it distasteful but it is contrary to all business principles; it is contrary to good morals; and I do not believe that the American people would sanction such a course. It would be far better to impose additional taxes on the revenue that is yet to be made for this year than on that which has already been made, taxed, and perhaps spent.

Then the Senate committee excluded the inheritance tax, the insurance tax, the gross-sales provision—which is the most unfair tax that can be conceived of imposing upon the business of this country—and the unscientific plan of the imposition of a 10 per cent tariff tax upon all importations, whether they are now entering this country free or dutiable.

Then there is the tax upon the light, the heat, and the gas that is used in the home of every person, at least those living in cities, and now in almost all parts of the United States the people are using electric light. To impose upon every household in the United States a 5 per cent tax on the little amount of gas that it may use for cooking or light, for electric light, or the amount it pays by way of telephone charges, it seemed to your committee was altogether too small business. We did not think we should begin so early imposing special taxes for war purposes.

Mr. President, this bill is not as I would have prepared it, and I shall develop that thought later in discussing the amendments that I am in favor of and those to which I am opposed; but the committee did what in its judgment it thought was best for the business interests of this country and for the people in general. There was no partisanship shown in the committee. There was no sectionalism developed there in the consideration of the taxes to be imposed. Since my service in this body I have passed through the preparation of two tariff bills. Of course they have always been prepared in a partisan sense, but in this bill there was not a single Senator on the Finance Committee who objected to a tax imposed upon the products of his State, if such a tax was necessary and was justifiable. The one thought was to raise the necessary revenue consistent with the prosperity of the business interests and the people of our country.

The committee labored for eight long weeks in the consideration of the bill. We gave hearings, which the House committee refused, and not only hearings in the open that were recorded but hearings to any representative from any part of the country, representatives of any industry or business of the country. I do not believe there will appear very much criticism among the people of the United States upon the provisions of the bill as reported to the Senate when the people understand where the taxes are laid.

As I stated a while ago, this is only the beginning of direct taxation. I said that, Mr. President, because it must be evident to every Senator and every business man of the country that if the war continues one year we will be compelled to raise either by taxation or by bonds an amount far exceeding the twenty-five billion mark. I do not know how much we shall have to raise to advance to our allies. I know they have got to receive help financially; I know they are all looking to the United States for their assistance, and I know the American people want one thing, and one only, no matter what it costs them, and that is to win the war and win it quickly.

There is no question but the Senate committee bill is a great improvement over the House bill both in the sources from which the taxes are to be raised and the rate of taxation imposed. The business of the country is called upon to pay the greater part of the money raised by the pending revenue bill, but before long other sources from which revenue can be obtained will be resorted to. The charge that the changes made by the Finance Committee of the Senate impose taxes upon the poor people of the country and relieve the business of the country from the imposition of taxes commensurate with what they ought to pay I say is not true.

There is only one way to raise this vast sum of money and that is by taxation, and the American people might as well understand it now as later, as I said before. Under the circumstances we find ourselves in there is only one thing for us to do and that is to make up our minds that there will not be imposed upon the people of this country or the business of the country a greater taxation than is absolutely necessary. If we fail in this war, there will be no peace or liberty for us or for the world.

As far as I am concerned, I am going to give this administration all the money it requests, all the power it demands, all the men it calls for, and the responsibility of winning the war must rest with it. I am not worrying about what is going to happen to me politically for any votes that I have cast. I admit freely and frankly that if it were not for the conditions existing to-day I never would think of voting for legislation that has been passed at this session of Congress. Much of it is next to revolutionary. The administration later will have to account to the people for the expenditure of the vast sums appropriated, the use of powers granted, and as to our armies and navies in bringing the war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. President, I shall not take any further time of the Senate to-day, but when the bill is before the Senate for amendment then I hope to take some little time in giving my reasons why I either support or why I oppose certain amendments in the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. I direct the attention of the Senate to page 57 of the bill, subsection (b), which provides for a tax of 5 cents for each admission of each person admitted free to any place for admission to which a charge is made, to be paid by the person admitted.

There is all over the country a practice of the street railroads to maintain what are called amusement parks. They maintain them, as the Senator knows, because in the evening the railroad equipment is not so busily engaged. In the morning and forenoon the cars are taking people to work and to business, and in the afternoon they are taking them back. So the railroads, to induce people to ride in the evening, maintain amusement parks, and the practice is merely to charge the car fare to the park and then they are admitted free. It is a very good practice, not only for the railroads but for people who have not automobiles. A great many people on warm evenings will take advantage of the practice to ride on the electric cars 5 or 10 miles into the country and sit in a cool place, and then go home. I should like to ask the Senator whether the committee considered the effect this would have on street railroads? It would be a very severe tax, and I am of the opinion that an exception should be made.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do not believe that there is a provision in the bill that was called to the attention of the committee as many times as this one provision that he refers to. I do not remember, however, that the case referred to by the Senator was ever called to the attention of the committee. The Senator will notice that we have made an exception in case of bona fide employees and children under 12 years of age and municipal officers on official business. We thought by that exemption we had covered nearly all the real meritorious cases. It is a new case, I will say to the Senator, that he presents, and I would be very glad to have him bring it up later when that particular part of the bill is reached.

Mr. HOLLIS. I merely wanted to find out whether the committee had acted, because I think if the matter were fully discussed and acted upon it would be apt to be reopened. As it is a fresh matter I may be able to get some attention to it. I thank the Senator.

AN UNSHACKLED POSTAL SAVINGS BANK AS A MEASURE OF PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No step could be more vital to the successful conduct of the war than the conservation of the financial resources of the Nation. The nations engaged in the present world conflict are straining every energy to obtain funds with which to continue the struggle. The most powerful aid yet rendered by the United States to its allies has been in the way of enormous loans.

As a part of its war program the United States Government recently called on its people for a loan of $2,000,000,000 at 3½ per cent. Another loan is to follow and still another as the war goes on. To-day no one may see the end. Congress has already authorized the Government to negotiate loans to the extent of $7,000,000,000. In addition, taxes are being imposed which reach into the billions and these are to be followed by others as the necessities of the most stupendous war of history develop. Furthermore, the cost of living has soared to appalling heights.

Any method, therefore, by which the financial resources of the American people or the American Government may be husbanded and multiplied will be of infinite value. In fact, it will be one of the determining weapons of the war. Men say that the aeroplanes will win the day, but behind the aeroplane must be money. Men say we must have modern guns and an ample supply of munitions and other equipment of the latest and most effective type. Behind all these must be money. Men say, and say properly, that our soldiers must be carefully equipped and properly fed; but before this can be done money must be had and in quantities never before realized by the human mind in this connection. Hand and hand with man power goes dollar power. In fact, at every stage in the prosecution of the war a supply of funds is an essential prerequisite.

Now, it is a well-recognized fact that the principal form of money to-day, both in war and peace, consists in paper evidences of credit, based on the confidence of ultimate payment in metallic money—mainly gold. The existing banking system, in mobilizing metallic money and in erecting thereon a tremendous structure of credit, has made modern civilization and development possible and is rendering a service to the world as indispensable as it is valuable. Efficient as it is, however, the present banking system in the United States had mobilized only about half the actual money in the United States at the opening of the present war. Since the war began about $1,000,000,000 in gold has been driven to the United States to aid in financing the enormous purchases made here by other countries. Most of this billion dollars will be attracted back to these countries after the close of the war by the higher premiums which they will pay for the means of reconstruction. This makes it all the more necessary that we should mobilize all the actual money in the United States, or as much of it as possible, in order to be the better prepared to meet the strain on our credit system which will undoubtedly follow the disappearance of this foreign gold. Since it came here our credit system has expanded in the usual proportion. That proportion is about 7 cents of gold to every dollar of credit. When it goes part of our credit structure will lose, and perhaps suddenly lose, its foundation. Therein lies danger.

In permitting about two billions of actual money to remain outside the banks, outside the channels of credit, we are allowing a Niagara of power to be wasted every day and every night.

How may that money be drawn from the hiding places and made to serve the country by enormously increasing its credit facilities and its financial power? The banks have failed to get it, although our American bankers and financiers are among the earth's ablest and best. Evidently some other form of banking must be tried, in addition to, and in connection with, that we already have. Banking in one sense is the manufacturing of credit, and credit in the modern, practical sense means a promise to pay, based on metallic money, chiefly gold.

The answer is, let the United States become a permanent banker for the American people. Unshackle the postal savings bank. Let the people's bank serve the people.

Recently the United States asked the people to lend it $2,000,000,000 at 3½ per cent. The response was immediate and inspiring. The people deposited that amount at once with the Government, because of absolute confidence in the safety of the transaction. Why not keep the Government depositary open permanently to the people? Instead of paying 3½ per cent interest on multiplied billions at stated periods, why not give all the people, so desiring, an opportunity to redeposit the interest due them, and thus to a great extent stop a drain on the Treasury and on taxation that promises to be tremendous? Most of the subscribers to the war loan will redeposit the interest in some bank, anyway.

Do you say that this is putting the Government into the banking business? The Government has already entered the banking business. Since we established the postal savings bank only a few years ago, 700,000 depositors have placed therein $125,000,000. And this has been done in spite of the fact that these depositors get only 2 per cent interest, while the ordinary private savings bank pays 3 per cent, and sometimes more—in spite of the fact that a number of restrictions are thrown around the postal deposit which the private banks do not impose at all—in spite of the fact that the Government redeposits these $125,000,000 in the commercial banks at 2¼ per cent, the banks lending it to the people at anywhere from 6 to 12 per cent, and at times more.

The Government practices an enormous injustice on its 700,000 depositors. It pays them only 2 per cent for what is worth at least twice that much, keeping in mind the average interest rate on money. But the Government has demonstrated two facts of lasting significance. It has shown that the cost of mobilizing money through the postal bank is not more than one-fourth of 1 per cent, and it has earned in this way over $2,000,000 of profit on the limited business already done.

Nearly half of the population of the State of Victoria, Australia, is represented by depositors in the Government savings bank of that State. Over half of the people of the State of Connecticut is represented by depositors in the savings banks of that State. It is not unreasonable to suppose that the same or a greater ratio would be maintained as to depositors in a United States postal savings bank offering 3½ to 4½ per cent interest. This means that the unshackled postal savings bank of the United States would have from forty-five to fifty-five million depositors, and with the same ratio of deposits as is maintained by the savings banks of New York City to its population, the United States postal savings bank would have deposits of anywhere from twenty-seven to forty billions of dollars. Incidentally let it be remarked here that with deposits of forty billions the United States postal bank could have financed the entire $7,000,000,000 bond issue recently authorized by Congress by an investment of less than one-fifth of its depositors, an operation that would have been considered entirely safe and conservative under the strictest standards. At the same time the Government would be earning the interest due the people with the money they had deposited, and would be paying them a higher return than they must now pay by onerous taxation. What kind of business judgment is it that prevents us from taking a step so simple, so just, so logical as that of unshackling the present postal bank?

Savings banks in the United States easily earn 3, 3½, and 4 per cent for depositors. Their loans are made in accordance with laws specifying the nature of the security with such minuteness that the duty of making the loans is almost a purely ministerial one—simply that of tracking the law. Shall it be said that similar laws could not be enacted for the United States postal banks?

Are not the 700,000 depositors of $25,000,000 in the postal savings bank entitled to what this money will earn on security recognized and defined by law—security recognized as of the safest sort—such security as every savings bank gets for loans, earning an interest rate twice as high and more than that now paid the depositors in the postal bank?

At this point let us summarize what has gone before:

1. The response to the call for the recent liberty loan shows the readiness with which the people will deposit funds with the United States. It is also an encouragement of the savings habit that will be worth as much to the people as the amount of the loan.

2. Why not make the opportunity of depositing with the United States permanent and unlimited? The people would then have a depositary which could never fail, which would hold their absolute and lasting confidence. A perpetual encouragement of thrift and saving among the people would then be offered—the most powerful that could be imagined.

3. Existing banks have gathered for use in the development of the country only about half the actual money in the United States. Allow deposits to any amount in the United States postal savings bank, and the remaining billions of money now scattered throughout the land in private and secret places would be assembled and would form the basis of a mightier credit structure than has yet been dreamed. The resulting impetus to business, to economic advancement, and to general prosperity could not be estimated.

4. Let the deposits thus assembled be loaned under laws defining the security, as is now so successfully done in the mutual savings institutions of the various States. Let the interest thus earned be returned to depositors, less expense of management, which expense has already been shown to be not more than one-fourth of 1 per cent.

5. Money at 3½, 4, and 4½ per cent would then be comparatively plentiful, where first-class security could be furnished. Interest rates throughout the country on funds for necessary and legitimate processes of production and growth would fall. Rural-credit systems would be made possible. A new reservoir of mobilized money would be added to that already established by existing banks, and the financial resources of the country would be developed to the highest point. Existing banks may utilize this reservoir by making loans of a portion of the funds comprising it, which loans they guarantee, receiving a small commission on the interest, and by acting as agents for receipt of deposits.

6. The Nation would be prepared not only for financing the war, for financing the people on the lowest possible terms, for securing to them an adequate and safe return on their savings, but for the problems that will follow the war, for the shock which the withdrawal of immense quantities of basic money will produce.

7. Why should not a citizen receive for his savings all that such savings will earn when loaned on the best security? Why should not a citizen, possessing proper security, have ready and fair access to the assembled savings of the people for the essential processes of home building and production of life's necessities? These processes, properly safeguarded, afford in themselves the best security known to men.

With these preliminary observations, I now direct attention to the bill I have introduced for the unshackling of the postal savings bank, S. 2161, a bill to increase the utility of the postal savings bank, to encourage savings among the people, and to secure the largest returns for such savings consistent with adequate security.

The bill begins as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the short title of this act shall be "The industrial savings act."

This is the first section and gives the short title of the act, namely, "The industrial savings act."

SEC. 2. That a board of trustees is hereby created for the administration of this act, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor, all acting ex officio, to be known as the industrial savings board.

This section broadens and strengthens the present board of the postal savings bank by increasing the number from three to seven. At present the board consists of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General. These officials are retained by the above section, and the following added: The Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor. These officials represent the basic elements of the country. They are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They guide and shape the policy of the bank established by this bill, within the very definite limits which it provides. They will not have time for the work in detail, but they will fashion general policies, choose and supervise competent heads and principal employees, who will do the work, under the safe, businesslike rules of the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 3. That for the proper and efficient organization and conduct of the business of the industrial savings board it shall appoint, under the rules of the Civil Service Commission, a first chief, a second chief, and a third chief, having such powers and duties as the board may designate; also such other assistants, attorneys, and other employees as the board may consider necessary. The compensation of the persons so appointed and other expenses of operation under this act shall be such as the industrial-savings board may authorize, and shall be paid from the profits of the postal savings bank.

This section takes the postal savings bank out of politics, and provides that expense of operation shall be paid from the profits of the bank by depositors and borrowers, instead of being taken from the pockets of taxpayers by appropriations from the Treasury. The wisdom and fairness of this section can not be questioned.

SEC. 4. That the industrial savings board shall, as soon as possible, take over the control of the existing postal savings bank, the details of its administration to continue in connection with the post offices throughout the country, under the direct supervision of the Postmaster General acting for the board.

SEC. 5. That as soon as arrangements can be made therefor every post office, postmaster, and all letter carriers and other post-office employees shall hereafter be made to serve the people through the postal savings bank as they now serve them for letters, money orders, registered letters, and parcel post, without limitation as to amount of deposits, as letters and parcels are without limitation, the manner of such service being as in this act provided, and all limitations on the amount of deposits in the postal savings bank are hereby removed.

SEC. 6. That postmasters and other employees in the service of the postal savings bank at the time of the transfer of said bank to the industrial savings board shall continue in office until it is found from experience that any one of them is inefficient, when such employee may be removed according to rules and regulations which the board shall establish, with the approval of the Civil Service Commission, and the successors of those who may be removed shall be appointed under the rules of the Civil Service Commission.

The Post Office Department is already one of the most enormous, best organized, best equipped, and best conducted business plants in the world. In connection with the enlarged postal savings bank it is proposed almost to double, or more than double, its utility at an increase of expense remarkably small when results are considered. This act will establish within the Post Office Department the largest, strongest, and most useful financial institution in the world.

Observe that there is to be no limitation as to the amount anyone may deposit. At present no one may deposit more than $1,000 and receive interest thereon, but may deposit an additional $1,000 provided no interest is to be paid. Note that carriers, rural and city, must accept deposits for the postal savings bank, and deliver receipts as they must accept and deliver letters, money orders, parcels, and so forth. Also they may, if desired, take checks to the bank, cash them, and return the proceeds to the owner. They are agents both of the bank and the people. What a service this will be to the masses of the people, who need not leave their homes or other places of business in order to deposit their savings or draw funds as they may need them! The Government thus maintains a perpetual open door to thrift and economy, the only permanent foundation of general prosperity. See section 16.

SEC. 7. That of the funds which are now or may hereafter be deposited in the postal savings bank, not to exceed 25 per cent of the balance in hand at any time, may, in the discretion of the industrial savings board, be invested in the bonds of the United States, bought in the open market at the lowest obtainable price or bought at such price from the Treasurer of the United States. Any portion of said bonds may, in the discretion of the board, be sold in the open market at the highest obtainable price or sold to the United States Treasury at such price.

This section affords financial preparedness for the Nation on a scale hitherto unparalleled. The investment in United States bonds is an opportunity, not a requirement. The postal savings bank will naturally tend to absorb all available United States bonds on the market, and will thus reduce the interest rate the United States will have to pay for loans. If the unshackled savings bank were in operation to-day, there would be no talk of a higher interest rate for the next liberty loan. The right to sell any portion of the bank's United States bonds in case of need provides a liquid reserve power that is not excelled, if indeed it is equalled, in the financial world, since the bonds of the United States have a world market well-nigh without limit.

SEC. 8. That no other investment of the funds deposited shall be made, but, with the exception of a working reserve, the amount of which shall be determined by the industrial savings board, the balance of the funds shall be loaned at the highest obtainable rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent per annum on what, in the discretion of the industrial savings board, is considered as adequate security, in manner as follows and as in this act further provided:

(a) Preference shall be given—

(1) To small loans over large loans.

(2) To short-time loans over long-time loans.

(3) Loans adequately secured by readily marketable collateral over loans on real estate or other less-readily marketable security.

(b) In accordance with the above the board shall, from time to time, fix the rate of interest to be charged according to the supply of the demand of loanable funds, the profit and security of the depositors being the basis of decision, the maximum rate not to exceed 5 per cent per annum.

(c) The borrower shall always be required to protect the market value of his collateral, as is customary with other banks making similar loans, either reducing the loan or providing additional security in case of falling market.

SEC. 9. That the industrial savings board shall give clear and ample publicity to its rulings as to character of securities required for loans and the terms of such loans under the following limitations:

(a) Loans not to exceed 95 per cent of the market value of United States bonds or the bonds of States.
(b) Not to exceed 90 per cent of the market value of such other securities as are now admissible investments under the existing laws of New York or Massachusetts for savings banks or as are estimated by the industrial savings board as of equivalent good standing.
(c) Not to exceed 85 per cent of the market value of wheat, cotton, or other nonperishable products, so called, in safe, adequately insured public storage, under regulations as the board may prescribe.

These sections contain conservative and practical provisions insuring the safe and proper conduct of the bank. The borrower must protect the market value of his collateral, and no collateral is accepted at its full market value. All borrowers are on an equal footing—the banker, the merchant, the farmer, the millionaire, the man of limited means. If any preference is shown at all, it is to the small loan over the large one. The farmer is enabled to borrow money at not more than 5 per cent on nonperishable products, properly stored, to the extent of 85 per cent of their value.

The laws of New York and Massachusetts are referred to above merely as examples of laws defining security. All the provisions of these laws may not be found applicable to the postal savings bank, especially those relating to local railroad bonds. The savings bank laws of all the States and of foreign countries should be studied and their best features adopted.

SEC. 10. That not to exceed 50 per cent of the deposits in hand at any time may be loaned, to an amount not exceeding one-half the appraised value, on unencumbered real estate in States and Territories where laws for the protection of creditors are by the industrial savings board deemed adequate and fair, in manner as folows:
(a) Through any national bank or other incorporated bank or corporation whose business is dealing in or guaranteeing real estate mortgages and which is subject to the examination and control of the United States Treasury or of the banking department of any State which in the estimation of the industrial savings board adequately protects depositors, loans may be made to an amount at one time outstanding not to exceed ten times the capital and surplus of the bank or corporation, which shall be required to guarantee the prompt payment of the principal and interest of the loans made through said bank or corporation.
(b) The bank or corporation shall be entitled to a commission of 5 per cent of the interest paid on such loan by the borrower (or such less per cent as the board may prescribe), who shall not be subject to any other charge except the necessary expense of examination of title and drawing papers, which charge may be fixed by rules of the industrial savings board, all terms and commissions to be uniform throughout the United States.

Note that loans on real estate are to be made through banks and other financial institutions of established standing which guarantee principal and interest for a small commission on the interest paid. The borrower pays the expense of examining title, drawing papers, and so forth. Savings banks generally lend more than 50 per cent of their deposits on real estate, while building and loan associations invest in this way nearer 100 per cent of their funds. The banks through which real estate loans may be made have established machinery and facilities for making loans. They have the necessary knowledge of local conditions and personalities. Self-interest will prevent them from making excessive or risky loans, and they can probably do this business at less expense than that with which the postal bank could itself organize and conduct a safe loan board. If they are compelled to foreclose, they will be entitled to such costs and fees as the courts allow.

The commission in the great cities allowed agents for collecting rents is from 1 to 5 per cent of the rent—commonly 2 per cent for large buildings. The monthly collection of rents is certainly more onerous and expensive than the collection of interest on mortgages once or twice a year. Interest is the rent of money. The commission runs during the life of the loan and is payable annually.

Let us illustrate. A bank with $100,000 of capital will first loan its own funds to such extent as it pleases under legal limits; then it may loan for the postal bank to any amount not exceeding $1,000,000. Interest on loans of $1,000,000 at 5 per cent is $50,000 a year; 5 per cent commission on such interest is $2,500 a year. Thus its loans for the postal bank produce a perpetual income of $2,500 a year, with trifling, if any, additional rent or clerk hire. How many times, under present conditions, are the banks compelled to quit lending because of lack of loanable funds?

Note further that this commission of 5 per cent is double that allowed for dealings in the New York Stock Exchange, and still further that it is annually renewed during the life of the loan, instead of being paid but once, as on the New York Stock Exchange.

SEC. 11. That personal loans without requirement of collateral security by the postal savings bank may be made in manner as follows:
(a) The borrower to make written statement showing his assets and liabilities; the amount of loan not to exceed $1,000; the length of time, which shall not exceed one year; the purpose for which the loan is to be used, which shall be in accordance with the stated purpose of this act; which statement shall be attached to the borrower's negotiable note.
(b) The principal and interest of the loan to be guaranteed prompt payment by a bank or corporation, as in section 10 of this act, which shall be entitled to a commission of 5 per cent of the interest paid thereon, or less, as the board may direct, the borrower being subject to no other charge, and the total of such loans at one time outstanding not to exceed five times the capital and surplus of the guarantor.
(c) The limit of the loans specified in (a) of this section, if after two years' trial is deemed too small for the best results, may be extended by the board from time to time to larger specified sums, the terms to be uniform throughout the United States.

Personal loans are made without collateral through the banks, other financial institutions, and so forth, which guarantee principal and interest for an annual commission of 5 per cent on the interest. The bank through which the loan is made may exact what security it pleases.

Here is the possibility of $1,250 additional income a year for the bank with $100,000 capital. Remember that the bank has the opportunity first to utilize its own capital on the "pick" of the loans. So we have an annual profit for the bank in question of $3,750 for handling the funds of the postal bank, the borrower getting his funds at 5 per cent or less. Now observe further, that this profit may be approximately doubled by the commission received by the bank on the deposits it receives and maintains for the postal bank under section 18.

SEC. 12. That to induce the largest possible savings and serve the greatest possible convenience, security, and economy of use to depositors and to the postal savings bank, the industrial savings board shall cause to be prepared and issued certificates of deposit of the size and form, but different in color and appearance, of customary bank currency, the said certificates being of the following tenor and in manner indicated.
(a) The United States Postal Savings Bank has received from (here the depositor will write his own signature and address in ink, thus identifying his signature on the back when he passes the same) $10 (or other specified sum), and will pay the same after three months from date of issue at its office in Washington, D. C., together with all net interest earned hereon, the interest compounded semiannually, on surrender hereof properly indorsed.
(b) This certificate to be duly executed, dated, and recorded where issued, as done in case of money orders.
(c) Certificates in this form shall be issued in denominations of $10, $50, $100, $1,000, and larger, as the industrial savings board may order.
(d) Certificates similar, but payable to bearer on demand at the office of the postal savings bank at Washington, D. C., and bearing no interest shall be issued in depominations of $1, $2, and $5.
(e) To encourage the beginning of deposits, and also serve the convenience of those who desire them in preference to coin money, certificates payable to bearer, without interest, shall be provided in denominations of 5 cents, 10 cents, 25 cents, and 50 cents, of size and form similar to United States fractional currency issued in 1862 and later.
(f) Simple printed instructions for their use may appear on the front or back of each of the various certificates.
(g) These certificates shall not be legal tender nor in any way indicated as "money" but may pass from hand to hand by mutual agreement as is done in the case of "certified" or other bank checks.

Two kinds of certificates are created by this section: (1) Those in denominations of $10 or more, which bear interest and are payable to order; (2) those in denominations of $1, $2, and $5, and of fractional parts of $1, which carry no interest and are payable to bearer. These certificates being easily negotiable will practically supplant actual money. They will do away with the cumbersome check system, the elaborate bookkeeping it entails, as well as the present expensive exchange system. They are good anywhere in the United States, just as gold certificates are good, though the gold is in the United States Treasury vaults. These certificates are not money any more than national-bank notes.

This plan to mobilize money will bring into the postal and other existing banks the more than $2,000,000,000 of so-called "real money" not now in any bank, thus nearly doubling the foundation resources of banks, which money, being loaned, redeposited, and loaned again, as money always has been since banks were invented, will grow to many billions of dollars.

The present gold basis of all money is in no way altered. Of course, actual gold will be called for only as limited commercial exigencies compel its use, because gold in possession earns no interest, while certificates of deposit in possession earn compound interest.

You gave the postal bank $10 in gold, or what will get the gold, and you prefer this to gold because this earns compound interest for you while you hold it, for the next man when you pay it over. Printed tables tell you its value, at 5 per cent or other interest, for any number of days, months, or years. The bank has loaned your gold, "on call," on security of municipal bonds, at 4 per cent; or on wheat or cotton for a month or a year, at 5 per cent; or on farm mortgage, 5 years, at 5 per cent, to the highest bidder in each case. Whoever got the gold of course deposited it again in the postal bank and took the certificate like yours, and the bank of course loaned the gold again, and so on, perhaps ten times over, so that $10 gold is earning, possibly, 50 per cent per annum, and the postal bank still has that gold to loan to the next man. This shows how banks have got rich in the past; how depositors will get rich hereafter.

Nobody wants to keep that gold any more than you want the man's yardstick when you buy 10 yards of muslin. If you get $1, $2, or $5 certificates, they are payable "to bearer" and draw no interest on their face, but the bank loans the gold all the same and so earns increased interest on your $10, $100, and $1,000 certificates.

This automatic mobilizer does away with all necessity for the clumsy, antiquated "individual accounts" bookkeeping methods and would reduce bank expenses in that respect to one-fourth or one-tenth of present cost and be far more convenient for depositors and just as safe as now.

SEC. 13. That at the county seat of every county in the United States, or similar civil divisions otherwise called, and in such other cities as the industrial savings board may select, post offices shall be designated by the industrial savings board as postal savings banks of issue and redemption.

(a) Such banks of issue and redemption shall issue and record as required by the industrial savings board certificates of deposit as described in section 12 hereof, in exchange for bankable funds as per regulations made by said board, and may redeem the same, whether issued by itself or by other similar banks of issue and redemption, either in money or in new certificates of deposit, as the applicant may desire.

(b) Each depositor in said banks shall record his signature and address in duplicate with the bank on a record provided, as is customary in commercial banks, so that indorsements of signatures on backs of certificates may be verified when desired.

SEC. 14. That the industrial savings board shall designate 12 or more districts covering the United States, in a central city of each of which it shall cause to be organized a district bank which shall act as clearing and reserve bank for all the banks of issue and redemption within the district, in accordance with rules and regulations of the industrial savings board.

SEC 15. That the industrial savings board shall further cause to be organized in the city of Washington, D. C., in the Post Office Department, a national central postal savings bank, which shall act as clearing and reserve bank for the 12 district banks, and may have direct dealings with and oversight of all the county banks of issue and redemption as the industrial savings board shall order.

SEC. 16. That every smaller post office and every letter carrier may, in accordance with regulations made by the industrial savings board, adequate bonds for safety being required as convenient, keep in hand limited amounts of certificates of deposit, secured from the local county banks of issue and redemption, to be given to known applicants in exchange for bankable funds to be forwarded to the county bank of issue and redemption, and may also redeem small certificates of deposit as they can conveniently. Such post offices and letter carriers shall also give proper receipts to any applicant for bankable funds or for certificates of deposit, to be sent to the county bank of issue and redemption to be exchanged for money or other certificates of deposit, and deliver the same to said applicant in exchange for their own receipt originally given to the applicant.

SEC. 17. That each county bank of issue and redemption and each district bank shall keep in hand such working balance as the industrial savings board shall direct, the county bank forwarding any surplus to its district bank, and the district bank any surplus to the national central bank, and each of said banks shall make loans as authorized by the industrial savings board, the county bank drawing for funds when deemed necessary on its district bank and the district bank drawing on the national central bank, as the industrial savings board may direct.

Briefly, these sections provide that postal banks shall be established in every county seat, other post offices in the county to be branches of the county-seat bank, under regulations of the board. The United States is to be divided into 12 or more districts, with a central postal bank for each district, which shall act as a clearing and reserve bank. A national central postal savings bank to be established at Washington, which shall act as a clearing and reserve bank for the district banks and which may have supervision over the county banks.

SEC. 18. That existing savings and other banks in the United States, which desire and will submit to satisfactory examination and supervision of the industrial savings board and are found of standing satisfactory to the board, may be made agents of the postal savings bank, to receive deposits and pay certificates in accordance with regulations made by the board, and shall be allowed as compensation for such service a commission to be authorized by the board and not to exceed 5 per cent of the net earnings of the deposits, as estimated by the industrial savings board, which said existing bank secures through its agency, such commissions to be uniform throughout the United States.

The provisions of this and other sections permitting any bank in the United States in good standing to become a deposit and loan agent of the postal bank would tend to strengthen rather than to injure by competition any and every such bank. Their depositors would not leave them for the postal, because they can supply the postal certificates when preferred to their own. As private enterprise and initiative have certain advantages over public institutions of this kind, due to more accurate knowledge of local conditions and opportunities and better means of keeping in touch with them, the agents by offering slight additional interest inducement may secure enlarged deposits for themselves. To applicants for loans the agent may always loan his own funds instead of loaning the postal funds if he desires.

Note the profit to existing banks in this connection, illustrated in note under section 11.

SEC. 19. That in lieu of the principle of amortization (which may be applied when the borrower desires) loans secured by real estate or other collateral may be made as follows:

The mortgage or other paper shall be drawn to secure any sum due from the borrower not exceeding the amount named therein for any time not longer than the longest time therein specified, the borrower thus being permitted to adjust the amount of his loan from time to time according to his needs and opportunities.

Under this plan, while the borrower would naturally make application for the largest loan which the pledged property would be sufficient to secure, his certificate, being passed, he would actually borrow not the most but the least sum that would serve him, and only as it was actually needed, and would repay it as fast as he could, so as to stop interest, knowing that he could at any time borrow again if he should have need or find profitable use for the money. This elasticity of loans would be of almost incalculable value to the borrowers, to the bank, and to the community, stimulating enterprise, thrift, economy, providence, and would certainly be more desirable than iron-clad, unalterable amortization loans.

SEC. 20. The industrial savings board shall test the safety and practicability of making small and short-time loans to farmers and other producers in manner as follows, and in accordance with such other regulations as may be specified by the board:

(a) After the total balance of deposits in the postal savings bank shall have reached the sum of not less than $1,000,000,000.

(b) The board shall select not to exceed 10 counties in various parts of the United States to make trial for a period of not less than one year, after which time, if in the opinion of the board the plan is successful, the method may be extended to many or all other counties.

(c) All persons desiring to borrow, without collateral security, any sum not to exceed $500 for a time not to exceed one year, each shall make a statement showing the amount of his assets and liabilities with their nature, in form and manner specified by the board, the amount of the loan desired, its length of time, and the purpose for which it is to be used, in accordance with this act, which statement shall be attached to the applicant's negotiable note.

(d) These applications shall be referred for approval or rejection to a committee of three persons elected by the applicants within the county and also to a committee of three persons elected by the depositors in the postal savings bank within the county, in manner provided here following: Loans to be allowed must be approved by not less than two-thirds of the weight of vote of each committee and also approved by one or more experts appointed by the board.

(e) The two said committees to be elected in manner, as follows: The postmaster to prepare printed ballots and send the same with return envelope to himself and send to each applicant and to each depositor in the county bank of issue and redemption having then, and three months previously, outstanding deposits at the time of $50 or more. Each such elector, applicant, or depositor shall be entitled to three votes, which he may cast for three, two, or one person of his choice. The persons so chosen, each having weight of vote according to the number of votes by which he is chosen, shall upon notice of the postmaster meet and choose three of their number to act as the committee, such electors balloting repeatedly as may be necessary to reduce the number to three. The committee thus elected, each shall have weight of vote according to the cumulative number of votes by which he is chosen.

(f) The members of the committee chosen shall have compensation for services in passing on loans at the rate of 20 cents an hour, the time to be approved by the county seat postmaster.

(g) Applicants whose loans are accepted shall give the bank their negotiable notes for the amounts and time approved, the same to be discounted by the bank at double the rate of interest current in postal savings bank for loans secured by collateral, the applicant being given the proceeds less his pro rata of all expense of passing on the loans. After the end of one year when all of the loans shall have matured, any profits to the bank on the total of the loans in excess of the current rate of interest for secured loans shall be paid as provided by the board in rebate to those whose loans were promptly and fully paid, so that the net cost of the loan to the borrower may possibly be reduced to approximately the same as the interest rate on secured loans.

(h) If after ample test such method of loaning is found safe and profitable the amount to be loaned to each applicant may be increased beyond $500, the increase to be uniform throughout the United States and not to exceed $1,000. If some counties prove to be habitually unprofitable while other counties prove habitually profitable, the board may withhold, temporarily, or longer, permission to make such loans from the unprofitable counties.

This section, as it specifies, is intended to be tentative and experimental. It is believed that generally throughout the United States practically all deserving wants of borrowers will be amply taken care of under sections 10 and 11. But the possibility of use being made of this section will have a healthy influence on banks acting as loan agents under said sections, and this plan of passing on loans, the depositors approving or rejecting, the borrowers assuming limited mutual responsibility, may in time be extended to real estate and other secured loans.

SEC. 21. That commercial and savings banks may make deposits in and draw upon county banks of issue and redemption to such extent as said county banks may be able conveniently to serve them, but may, without limitation, deal direct with the district banks and national central bank as per regulations of Industrial Savings Board, and certificates of deposit in the postal savings bank may be counted as part of the legal reserve of all national banks.

If any bank should prefer to keep gold or other form of so-called money as a reserve, it can do so; if such other form of reserve than certificates of the postal bank makes it any stronger, then it will have what advantage there may be in the increased strength. Certificates of deposit in the postal bank are not legal tender but each is a certified check, certified by the United States Government, and is good anywhere. Certified checks of banks are not legal tender, but do they not serve amply every commercial want except in rare technical legal quibbles? If what is offered is good—as gold is recognized as good even when not coined—it does not need to be legal tender. If it is not good—accepted by custom—it is at best a promise and commonly in some measure a deception, and in the end the man who labors is the man who loses most by the fraud. Of course, the law of the inviolability of contract will continue, and the debtor must always make good according to his contract, whether it is formal or by implication. Postal-bank deposits will always be good while the United States Government is good. This is perfect guaranty of deposits.

SEC. 22. That the board shall cause to be prepared and printed for the general public simple tables showing the value of $10 or larger sums at compounded interest for days, months, and years at various rates of interest, such as will be useful to depositors.

This will be a matter so simple that any intelligent person can know the value of the certificates he owns. What are the net earnings of the postal bank will quickly be known, will be steadily the same, or only slightly or gradually varying from month to month, and will be published daily in papers and periodicals.

Of course, it will be the smaller certificates, $5 and less, which do not on their face bear interest and are always worth par which will mainly pass from hand to hand. Larger interest-bearing certificates will pass principally in the same manner as the ownership of United States bonds passes, the market value of which is known every day.

SEC. 23. That needless expensive records and statistics shall be avoided, but the board shall provide for such as may materially serve the interest of depositors and enable the board to annually report to Congress such information and recommendations as may be of service to Congress.

SEC. 24. That to the extent that the mails shall be used in facilitating the business of the postal savings bank, either by the bank itself or by its patrons, the board shall provide special stamps for free use of the mails, keeping records so that approximately the actual cost of such postal service shall be paid by the postal savings bank to the Post Office Department.

SEC. 25. The sum of $1,000,000 is hereby appropriated for any necessary expense, in the discretion of the board, in the rapid development of the postal-savings bank, the sum used to be considered only as an advance and to be repaid to the Treasury, with interest thereon at 3 per cent per annum from the profits of the postal-savings bank, which is to be made self-sustaining without subsidy or other charge against taxpayers.

These provisions are matters of simple sense and justice, and encourage the most liberal use of the postal bank. Such use will be principally local, or within the county, and the actual cost of service for each transaction nearly infinitesimal; but whatever the cost is it will be paid by the bank at the expense of the beneficiaries, the depositors, and borrowers, and not of the taxpayers in general. This principle is maintained throughout the measure.

SEC. 26. That all provisions of an act to establish postal savings, etc., approved June 25, 1910, and of amendments thereto not inconsistent with this present act, shall continue in force, and all other provisions are hereby modified or repealed, as are all other acts of Congress inconsistent herewith.

This section explains itself. It continues the present postal-savings law, except as changed by this act.

SEC. 27. That to the extent that certificates of deposit in postal-savings banks crowd out of use forms of paper money now in use, causing the depreciation of the market price of bonds of the United States used to secure their circulation below par, the Treasurer of the United States shall purchase or redeem such bonds at par issuing, so far as may be necessary to do so, other bonds of the United States bearing higher rate of interest and marketable at or above par.

This provision also is a matter of simple justice to bankers who have invested in such bonds because of the currency advantages they gave. The United States received par for the bonds and the consideration for their use having in part terminated, the Government should pay par for them.

Never have justice, patriotism, necessity, and business sense united more emphatically than in this measure. It establishes a new and immense reservoir of capital on which all people and all institutions possessing requisite security may draw on terms of exact equality—a reservoir from which fresh streams of credit will issue to expand and multiply the channels of production, manufacture, and distribution. The element of personal rivalry will not be known. A man, although he may offer perfect security, will not be told at the postal bank that he can not be accommodated, because he has not been depositing there or does not belong to a certain business clique. The fact that this tremendous volume of credit is loanable at not more than 5 per cent will bring down and regulate interest charges everywhere. It will mean the economic independence of the American masses. The American people possess the means of creating this beneficent institution. They should demand its immediate erection.

Unshackle the postal-savings bank. Let the people's bank serve the people. Mobilize the dollar as well as the man.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, the Chair announces that a quorum is present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I give notice that on Wednesday, the 15th, I will address the Senate on the pending bill, when the bill is laid before the Senate. I will confine my remarks to the so-called excess-profits provision of the bill. I will undertake to show that the provision of the bill relating to excess profits is wholly bad; that it is grossly discriminatory; that it favors big business and penalizes little business because it is little.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I had not intended to address the Senate in a general way upon the provisions of this bill, but in the circumstances I think it is not inadvisable for me to do so.

I am mindful of the condition in which our country finds itself to-day. We have not anticipated for long any such condition as we now find. During the last campaign it was my pleasure to say to the people with whom I talked that we were fortunate in being at peace with the world. The expression, "The President has kept us out of war," has been heard from one end of this country to the other. It has been appreciated by every citizen. Even last spring and in the late winter there were but few who did not hope that this great catastrophe, so far as this country was concerned, might be averted; but, Mr. President, conditions changed; patience ceased to be a virtue; the time came when this Nation had to assert itself or hide its head in shame; when it could no longer remain at peace with the world with honor to itself.

My first recorded vote in this body upon a matter of legislation was for the declaration of war. At that time I realized the responsibility that I, together with the other Members of this body, was taking. I tried to realize the great burden which was being brought upon us; I tried to picture in my mind the horrors of war as well as the great financial burden of the war. I felt then and I feel now that our civilization is in the balance. I believed then as I believe now that every resource which this country can command must be mobilized and brought into this great maelstrom of conflict. I felt then, as I feel now, that every citizen of this country, regardless of age or physical condition, should be ready and willing to put upon the altar of his country his being, his life, and certainly all the financial strength which he can command. I think that will be necessary before the war ends, for our every interest is at stake; and I believe that the people of this Nation are willing to meet the burdens, that they are willing to make the sacrifices which will be necessary.

However, Mr. President, there is one thing that I believe is in the minds of the people of this Nation. They feel that this is a great democracy, and that in a democracy the burdens of government should rest as nearly equally as it is possible to provide. The principle underlying the law which we recently passed providing for the selection of men to shoulder the guns illustrates, to my mind, the principle which the people of this country want to invoke in the framing of all legislation.

From the four corners of this country, with scarce an exception, you may hear the approval of the people of this country for that law, which tries to impose the actual and the immediate burden of the war upon those who can best bear it and make the least sacrifice. The men between the ages of 21 and 31 were selected. That was not done from any haphazard reason, but it was done because it was realized that men of that age could perform the strenuous service of war with less sacrifice than could men of any other age. So they were selected.

Not only that, Mr. President, but under its application, and in its administration, provision has been made whereby those even within the ages mentioned in the selective-draft law may be searched out to determine to whom the greatest sacrifice will come; to ascertain who can do this thing with the least burden and do it most effectually.

So, Mr. President, with regard to the financial burdens, when your Finance Committee went into its council room to consider the question of raising the necessary revenue to carry on this great war, I believe that every member of the committee was actuated by the same high purpose. It is not possible for me to express a full appreciation of the work of the members of that committee, and especially of the chairman of the committee. For more than six weeks we have labored in the committee room almost incessantly, and when out of the committee room we met the people whose interests were being affected by this legislation, to get the point of view from the different sections of the country. In that committee room there was at no time any semblance of partisanship. Democrats and Republicans alike met around that council table and discussed with most earnestness these great questions of government. The bill which is brought into this Chamber and submitted to the Senate for its consideration brings with it the honest convictions of a majority of that committee.

I presume that there was scarcely an item in the bill which was not criticized or objected to by some members of the committee, but, all in all, the bill which is brought here represents the best judgment, founded upon honest consideration and exhaustive research, so far as practicable, and the committee presents it to the Senate under these circumstances. It is my belief and my hope that as to matters of detail, as to matters of little consequence, the Senate will give to this measure the presumption to which it is entitled.

When the committee met, one of the first questions which presented itself was as to the amount of revenue which the Government would need, the amount to be raised by taxation, and the amount to be raised by a bond issue. The various phases of that question were discussed at length and in great detail. We realized the immense expenditures necessary to be made; we realized that the armed forces of this country should not be stinted in their supplies; we realized that it is better to fight this war out in one or two years than to fight it out in three or four years; that every resource that could be utilized should be utilized now, so as to save to the future not only in treasure but in the manhood of the country. It was realized, however, that this war was not being waged for the benefit only of the present citizenship of the country. We felt that the fundamental causes underlying this war will affect not only this generation but all generations to come. We felt further, however, that the people of this day and of this generation, those who are older than those who will go into battle, should shoulder as much of the burden as it is possible for us to bear, so that when our boys come home maimed, perhaps, and broken in health, the burden upon them should be made as light as possible. So we want to raise as much money by taxation for immediate use as the conditions in the country will justify without serious injury.

The question arose as to how the money should be raised, and the objects or the subjects to be taxed. Some were of the mind that all the burden of immediate taxation should be placed upon incomes and war profits and intoxicating beverages. There is much to be said in favor of that position; but, Mr. President, the majority of your committee felt that this was not a war of the rich; it felt that it was a war affecting the liberty and the future prosperity of every citizen of this land, and of the very Government which permits us to enjoy the blessings of life; and we felt that, while we might impose this burden upon the wealthy class of the country, every citizen of the land, perhaps, would enjoy the privilege of contributing something to the purpose of this war. We felt that the humblest in the land would not want to feel that he was wholly exempt from the privilege of rising to the support of our country in its time of stress. So, Mr. President, as the final result, the committee has undertaken to put this burden upon those who can bear it best and where the sacrifice will be the least, but at the same time giving to every citizen the right to participate, at least to some extent.

This bill proposes to raise something more than $2,000,000,000. Over $1,557,000,000 of that sum is expected to be raised from incomes, war profits, and taxes on intoxicating liquors, pretty nearly meeting the views of those who thought that those three subjects should bear the entire burden. Upon them we have put more than three-fourths of the burden.

The income tax has been recognized for several years as a proper means of raising revenue for the support of the Government even in times of peace. We have gradually increased the income tax; but in that there is the same fundamental principle that he shall bear the burden who can bear it best and with the least sacrifice. The income tax is not made uniform; there is no flat rate upon incomes. We have allowed an exemption from any income tax for those who receive small incomes. We have tried to raise even the normal tax other than from those whose whole means are required or necessary for the support of a family, and then the income tax is gradually increased.

Under the first income-tax law the tax was graduated from 1 per cent to 6 per cent; in the succeeding law the surtax was graduated from 1 per cent to 13 per cent; and in this bill we propose to increase that tax so that the total graduated income tax shall range from 1 per cent to 50 per cent. It is recognized that the man who has a very large income can afford to sacrifice a larger percentage of it than the man with the small income. You take a man with an income of $10,000 and tax him 25 per cent, and you leave him $7,500. You take the man with an income of $100,000 and tax him 25 per cent, and he still has left $75,000 as against the $7,500 of the other man.

So, Mr. President, we expect to raise from the additional income tax under this bill over $777,000,000—more than one-third of all the tax sought to be raised by the bill. Is it not important, then, that this avenue for the raising of revenue should be so paved that all may travel it alike, that the burden carried shall weigh as nearly equal as practicable upon the shoulders of those who are to bear it? While I invoke all the presumptions which Senators can give to the report of a committee in favor of this report, there are some things in this bill to which all the committee could not agree.

I believe that, generally speaking, the minority of the committee—I mean the minority in opinion—should accept the views of the majority, but where the committee is almost equally divided and where the subject is important it seems to me that it is the duty of members of the committee to bring before the Senate any important question of that character. I purpose to bring before the Senate for its consideration one proposition to which a majority of the committee did not finally agree. I shall only refer to it now as an excuse for not discussing it more at length.

The experience of the Government regarding the income tax presents some very interesting conditions. There has been from the beginning of the income-tax law a normal tax of 1 per cent upon both individuals and corporations. Last year that was raised to 2 per cent. The normal tax was the only income tax imposed upon corporations. The surtaxes were levied only upon individuals, and a most interesting situation is found. I will only take a moment to call to the attention of the Senate a few facts in that connection.

Up to June 30, 1916, under the old law, where the normal tax was 1 per cent upon corporations and individuals, and where there was a surtax upon individual incomes ranging from 1 per cent on the incomes between twenty and forty thousand dollars up to 6 per cent on the higher incomes, we find this remarkable situation: The tax paid by corporations was $56,653,000; the tax paid by individuals was $67,000,000. In other words, there was a payment by individuals of $11,000,000 more than the tax paid upon corporate incomes, and this in the face of the fact that the corporate incomes amounted to $5,665,000,000, while the individual incomes amounted only to $2,399,000,000. Of this, only $23,995,000 was the normal tax of individuals. The same normal rate was paid upon corporate incomes, but there were surtaxes levied upon individual incomes which yielded almost $45,000,000. And so for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, while the corporate incomes were nearly $9,000,000,000 and the individual incomes only about $3,000,000,000, yet the income tax derived from individual incomes was within $123,000 of the total income tax derived from corporations. Under this bill, notwithstanding the fact that it is now proposed to make an addition of 2 per cent to the normal tax upon corporate incomes, making 6 per cent altogether upon corporate incomes, and to leave the normal tax upon individual incomes only 4 per cent—notwithstanding that, the amount of money estimated by the experts to be raised in this bill from individual incomes is $417,763,000 and that from corporations only $360,000,000, taking from individual incomes over $57,763,000 in excess of the amount taken from corporate incomes; and this in the face of the further estimate that the total incomes of individuals for this year will be less than four and a half billion dollars, while the total incomes of corporations will be over $9,000,000,000.

To my mind that is one of the inequities of this bill, and to rectify what I think is a gross error I intend later, during the pendency of this measure, to submit some amendments to the bill placing a surtax upon corporate incomes which are undistributed. But, aside from that provision, I know of no great harm which can come from the operation of this bill, and I believe I know of no great injustice.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask the Senator whether the figures he gave a minute ago in regard to the incomes of individuals and corporations were the gross incomes or the net incomes?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They were the net incomes.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. I am sorry to say that I did not listen to the early part of the Senator's speech. What have been the fundamental errors in computing these taxes to produce such a result as that to which he has called attention?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There has been no error in computing the taxes. The error has been in the law. The error is in the existing income-tax law and not merely in the proposed law. It is my purpose later on to suggest a revision of the present income-tax law in that regard.

Mr. PAGE. Is there any other tax upon corporations that in some way equalizes this seeming inequality?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all. There is a small excise tax, but it is so insignificaut that no one contends that it at all should operate or be considered as in any manner compensating for the inequity which I have just pointed out.

Mr. PAGE. I did not quite state what I meant. I spoke of the fundamental error. I meant more particularly the fundamental inequality or wrong. I did not quite see how it worked out, as the Senator has explained, that individuals were called upon to pay so much more than they ought to pay as compared with corporations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I beg the Senator's pardon. I supposed he was present when I tried to explain the cause for that.

Mr. PAGE. No.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In a word, I think I can put the Senator right.

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator has already given it at length, I do not want to have him repeat his statement; but if he can state it in just a word, I should be glad to have him do so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall not repeat at length, and it is not necessary to be lengthy in stating the proposition. There is no surtax upon corporate incomes and there is a surtax upon individual incomes.

Mr. PAGE. I see.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That explains the reason for this discrepancy.

Mr. PAGE. Can the Senator explain why that difference has been permitted to be made in framing the law?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, to my mind that is quite a lengthy story, and as I have just announced it to be my purpose to bring up the subject at a later date, when I expect to discuss at some length just the point the Senator now makes, I believe I will ask him to excuse me from answering at this time. I do not care at this particular time to consume so much of the time of the Senate as I should like to consume when I discuss the question.

Mr. President, the next method of raising revenue under this bill was the imposition of what we have chosen to call a war-profits tax. In the House bill which came over to the Senate it was called an excess profits tax, and the difference in terminology almost suggests the reason for the changes which we have made. Under the bill as it came from the House every line of business was permitted to retain, exempt from this tax, 8 per cent upon all of the capital engaged in the enterprise. As the bill came from the House it then levied a flat tax of 16 per cent upon all incomes in excess of 8 per cent on the capital employed. The House bill failed to take into consideration a thing which is known to every observer, that not all lines of business are expected or hope to make the same income. You take the banks. They do not expect to make the same income as the manufacturer. You take the railroads. They do not expect to make the same income as other lines of industry, and the reason of it is that the risk involved in the business varies. You take the concern which goes into the oil business. It may spend several years before it makes any profit. When the profit does come, often it comes in great abundance; and shall you tax that concern upon the same basis as the concern which has been going along for years making a comparatively even profit?

Moreover, the tax which was levied bore equally by percentage upon all incomes above 8 per cent. The country has recognized the advisability of graduation in levying an income tax, and no reason has been suggested why the tax upon excess profits or upon war profits should not be graduated in the same manner as the income tax.

Again, Mr. President, the House provision gave an exemption of 8 per cent upon the capital employed. How can you ascertain the amount of capital employed except by a valuation of the assets of all the corporations of the country? I believe you will agree that this is quite impracticable; so the committee thought we would get at the matter in a more practical way, and that we would base this tax not upon excess profits in the strict sense but upon the war profits, the profits which are being made and accruing out of this war. So we provided, according to the system adopted in other countries, that we would take the three years before the European war and we would let every business get the average income of those three years. If it had been making 6, 8, 10, or 12 per cent during those years, that was to be accepted as the prewar income, and the war profits over and above that were to be taxed.

A provision was made for those who were earning during those years subnormal amounts.

The suggestion was made that something should be done with reference to those concerns that had supernormal incomes prior to the war, and much can be said for inserting in this bill some provision which would reduce the exempted amount of those concerns which were making a supernormal income before the war. But that matter was discussed by the committee. It was a thing not easily understood. The committee finally acted upon it, and presented the plan which appears in this bill. Much can be said for some modification; but on the whole it seems to me that no great harm can come if the Senate adopts it as presented by the committee.

Mr. President, the next title of this bill relates to the taxes upon intoxicating beverages. The amount of the taxes has been largely increased. Nobody can say whether the increase should have been what it is in the bill—whether it should have been a little more or whether it should have been less. There were no means by which you could demonstrate as a mathematical problem how much tax should have been imposed upon intoxicating liquors, so the committee has tried to use its best judgment. We have adopted these rates, and we submit to the Senate the result of our deliberations. That the tax should be increased upon intoxicating liquors, I do not believe anyone will question. Certainly no member of the committee did. It was simply a question of how much the tax should be. The same thing was done in regard to wines and brandy and beer; and some tax was put upon even the soft drinks. We felt that that was an industry which could bear a small share of this burden without any great harm, and so a very small tax was provided to be raised from the consumption of so-called soft drinks.

The next subject was that of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes. While it was considered by the committee that the use of tobacco in a great measure is a luxury and ought to bear a fair share of the burden of raising revenue, yet at the same time it was felt that the use of tobacco was a luxury of the man of moderate means, and that so extensive had the habit become that it would be a distinct burden if a large tax were imposed. So you will find that the taxes upon tobacco are not increased to any very great extent, and you will find also that the tax, such as it is, is graduated so that the cheaper tobaccos and the cheaper cigars shall bear a less rate of tax than the more expensive kinds.

Mr. President, the next title of the bill presents some items of questionable advisability; for instance, a tax of 3 per cent upon the freight charges of the railroads. I can see how somebody may object to that. I can see how a good deal can be said against it. Yet the money to be derived from that source will be widely distributed. It will be put upon those who are doing the most active business. It is a tax which in large measure, if not entirely, will be paid by the consumer of the freight.

So we thought that could not do much harm and would be the means of raising considerable revenue.

In the express charges we made a change in the bill as it came from the House. The House fixed a charge of 6 per cent upon all express packages. You can readily see how impracticable it would be to collect such a charge as that in the case of small packages and the intermediate packages. The committee further considered the fact that the express business of the country is in direct competition with the Parcel Post System. The committee felt that inasmuch as the express business of the country had adjusted itself to the Parcel Post System that that relationship should not be disturbed. So we put a tax of 1 cent on a package where the express was 25 cents and less, and 1 cent for each additional 25 cents, and made the same change later in the Parcel Post System, so as to compensate the one for the other.

The next item in the bill as it came from the House was a tax upon insurance—life insurance, marine insurance, fire insurance, casualty insurance. Your committee felt that that was not a proper subject of taxation in these times, and so has eliminated that item from the bill.

The next general item in the bill as it came from the House is a tax on manufactures. That includes a large number of items. It is a tax upon gross sales of manufacturers. We objected to the principle of a tax upon gross sales, and we found that in order to collect that tax as it appeared in the House bill thousands of concerns in the country would have faced bankruptcy. Almost entirely we eliminated the tax upon gross sales and only retained the tax in those instances where it would not in our opinion injure the business.

In this connection it may be said that the House bill proposed a tax upon the output of automobiles, motor trucks, all cars or vehicles operated by motor power. We realized, of course, that that would be a tax carried on to the purchaser. We felt that the business of the country should be interfered with as little as possible. We put no tax upon the motor trucks, upon the motor wagons, and we thought that the tax upon the automobile itself should be paid directly by him who used the machine rather than tax the manufacturer and have him pass it on to the user. At any rate, that is the way the committee handled the problem. From that source we expect to raise $40,000,000 of revenue, and, to my mind, $40,000,000 raised in this manner will not seriously burden any citizen of the country.

We declined to put a tax upon the sales of musical instruments for reasons which are apparent to almost every Senator. They are educational instruments, not only the pianos but the mechanical instruments, the graphophone, the talking machine. They furnish amusement and entertainment for nearly every household in the land. They furnish amusement and entertainment for the humble homes of the land which could not be had for the same amount of money in any other way, and of which those humble homes would be absolutely deprived.

The same thing may be said of films for moving-picture shows. We found that the business would be destroyed if the tax imposed under the House bill were levied upon that industry.

Instead of levying a tax upon the manufacture of yachts, we propose to levy a tax upon the use of the yacht, varying in accordance with the size of the yacht, making the burden as light as possible.

We reduced the tax as it appears in the bill from the House from 5 per cent to 2 per cent upon perfumes, cosmetics, proprietary medicines, the various things which you purchase in the drug store. From chewing gum we removed the tax entirely because the articles which enter into the manufacture of chewing gum are heavily taxed under other provisions of the bill.

We inserted a tax of 2 per cent on cameras.

I have mentioned these things for the purpose of showing the underlying principle which actuated the committee throughout in the framing of the bill. We tried to put the load where it could be easiest borne, where everybody would bear a part, but where the strongest should shoulder the heavier burdens.

Such may be said also of the title dealing with the tax on admissions to theaters. We could not see any reason why the people who have the money to spend to pay 50 cents or $1 or $1.50 or $5 or $10 for theater tickets should not also contribute a little to the conduct of this war. But the committee considered that it was not wise to put a burden upon every kind of theater entertainment.

Some suggestion was made that the moving-picture shows ought to be taxed out of existence, but after that matter was discussed, instead of taxing them out of existence, the committee almost unanimously decided that there should be no tax upon moving-picture admissions except where the charge was above 25 cents. They furnish a means of education. I venture to say that every night there are thousands and thousands of men in this country who spend the evening with their families at the moving-picture show who doubtless otherwise would be found upon the street corner or in the saloons.

The committee took up the question of the stamp taxes. Very little change was made. There is no great principle involved in the matter of taxing by the sale of stamps. It is simply a question whether the particular article or the purchaser of the particular article can afford to pay or not. The question of how much is simply a matter of judgment or of opinion. So all the committee could do was to look into these questions and ascertain whether or not any particular industry or any particular class of people was to be unduly discriminated against or bear an unusual or a heavy burden. The committee exercised its judgment. These rates were put in the bill and I know of no serious objection to the rates which have been imposed.

The committee inserted one item, that of a stamp upon checks. During the Spanish War the Government imposed a tax of 2 cents upon bank checks. The majority of the committee at least felt that it created no great burden upon the public or upon the people who made particular use of bank checks. I do not recall that it was particularly complained about. It was a tax which it soon became convenient to pay through lithographing the stamp upon the check, and I could not see, and the majority of the committee could not see, why a reasonable revenue should not again be raised from the stamp upon bank checks.

We also put stamps upon conveyances and deeds, making very little change if any in the bill as passed by the House, and various other things.

The next most important item which was dealt with in the bill was the inheritance tax. The bill as it came from the House imposed a large tax upon inheritances. Your committee in considering that question felt that the present law upon inheritances would raise all the money that the Federal Government ought to raise from that source; that that has become a subject of almost universal taxation in the various States; and that there should be some source of revenue left to the States not materially affected by the laws of the Federal Government. Whether this was wise or unwise no man can tell. We must use our best judgment. This is the best judgment of the committee, and unless some very cogent reason can be suggested it seems to me that the suggestion from the committee is worthy of your support.

Now, Mr. President, we come to a topic which caused, perhaps, as much discussion in the committee as any other. The bill as it came from the House levied an import duty of 10 per cent upon all imports. Where there was already an import duty, the bill increased it by 10 per cent. If the article came in free of duty, a duty of 10 per cent was levied upon it. But, Mr. President, while upon the face of it it looked as if that would be an equitable thing to do in view of the exigencies of war, the provision would simply increase a burden which the importers had been bearing before. But when we looked into the question we found that the raw material which had been coming in untaxed was necessary to the man who used it, who manufactured it, and put it into the commerce of the country. We realized that to have imposed that horizontal tax would have disarranged and set awry nearly every schedule of the present tariff law and that to go into that question at this time was unwise. We felt that if the tariff should be revised it ought to wait until conditions are more settled than now. So we decided that that was an unwise thing to do, and we have sought to raise the same amount of money, and more, from other sources.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator if the committee were entirely unanimous in their opinion that that course should be taken?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes, sir; my recollection is that the opinion of the committee was unanimous upon that subject.

But, Mr. President, there is another tax imposed, one upon sugar, tea, and coffee. There was much debate in the committee as to whether a tax upon those commodities should be imposed or not. An appealing argument can be made that we should not levy a tax upon the breakfast tables of the country. But, Mr. President, a majority of the committee, at least, felt that every mother in the land, every widow in the land would feel proud to know that in the cup of coffee, the cup of tea she is contributing a mite to the support of her country in this great war.

Moreover, it was felt by a number that the prices of these commodities are so manipulated that it would not increase the cost to the consumer; that the dealers would charge as much per pound for coffee and tea and sugar as they could charge anyhow, and a majority of the committee concluded to give that thought, at least, the benefit of the doubt.

Reference was made this afternoon to the provision in the bill repealing the provision of the present law in regard to the drawback upon sugar. Under the existing law, which imposes a tax of 1 cent per pound upon imported sugar, if the same sugar is exported, there is a refund to the exporter of 99 per cent of the duty. That provision is all right in times of peace. If the business of the world were normal the effect of that sort of a law would simply be that the refiners of this country would bring here the Cuban and Porto Rican sugar, refine it, and export it, getting in the meantime the benefit of performing this service, employing American labor, reaping a reasonable profit for American enterprise, and do no harm to the country.

I listened to the colloquy to-day between the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and others. The principle developed in that colloquy is absolutely sound for times of peace, but conditions in these times are entirely different. America is the great sugar market of the world. Prior to the war it was Hamburg, Germany, but to-day the city of New York is the great sugar market of the world. In that market come our allies and come the neutral nations of the world to buy sugar. Under the law as it is to-day, in the market of New York there is an inducement to the extent of 1 cent per pound to sell the sugar of this country to our allies and to neutral countries rather than to sell it to our own citizen consumers. So, during the war, when we are inviting our allies to become purchasers of our material, and when, if the recent report in the papers is true, we are going to see to it that our allies can purchase our commodities upon the same terms as our own Government, are we going to say that they shall have this additional privilege and that we are going to give them a bonus of 1 cent per pound for taking sugar from our own people?

These are war times. We have got to deal with conditions as we find them. America is going to remain the sugar market of the world during the war. This provision inserted in the bill is simply a part of this great war program.

Mr. President, I do not want to refer at length to the tariff question, but it was urged, upon me at least, that instead of levying this excise tax, this tax upon sugar consumed and sold in the market, we should levy it only upon the importation of sugar. This was urged upon me by a man representing the great beet-sugar refining interests of this country. He thought it ought to be done to protect and to encourage the beet-sugar industry of my section of the country.

I do hope, Mr. President, that my State will ultimately be one of the greatest producers of beet sugar. All of the conditions necessary are there found. That will result beyond question in the near future.

But, Mr. President, when I asked him who was to be encouraged by putting a tax upon the importation of sugar rather than upon the use of sugar, he undertook to say that it was the beet grower of the West. I reminded him that before the war, notwithstanding the tariff we had upon sugar, the beet growers of Germany, producing sugar in competition with the world, received more for their beets than did the growers of Colorado or Utah. He said this had been somewhat changed, that they had increased the price to the beet grower. I asked him how much. He said they had increased the price to about $8 a ton. I asked him if he fixed the flat rate of $8 per ton. No, he said; he did not; but for sugar beets, where the sugar content was 15 per cent, they would give the grower one bag of sugar, or 100 pounds. Beets with 15 per cent content of sugar produce three bags of sugar to the ton, or 300 pounds. So he proposed to give to the grower one bag out of three for producing the beets, a thing just as necessary as the refining plant itself.

Mr. President, it is well known throughout the West that in some instances the refiners, with sugar at a less price than it is to-day, have made in a single year enough profit to pay for the whole plant. Yet the citizens of Colorado and the West, where the beets are grown, pay for the sugar which they consume the price of sugar in New York plus the freight from New York to Colorado.

Mr. President, the next title in the bill is that relating to postal rates. This has been one of the most confusing and perplexing questions found in the bill. The committee in its report says that it does not know whether it solved the question right or not. I do not either; but we have done the best we could. Later on, when we come to the item, I shall try to explain why we could not very well have done otherwise. The zone system for second-class mail matter as it came from the House to at least a majority, if not to all the members of the committee, appeared to be unwise. They felt it would be destructive to a large number of the business interests of the country. But more than that and beyond that we saw a much broader question. We did not want to provincialize this country. We felt that the people in the Middle West, and in the West, and on the Pacific coast ought to have accessible precisely the same information, the same literature, that is found upon the Atlantic coast.

We felt that in this country, embracing so many different types of people, the tendency should be to unify the country, to disseminate equal information, and to forward the great development of the intellectual citizenship of the country.

There are other matters to which I should like to call attention—amendments to the present law—but these are matters of detail which will be discussed when the particular items are reached.

As I stated previously, on some later day—and I hope within the next two or three days—I shall present to the Senate some suggestions regarding a surtax upon undistributed incomes of corporations. I believe that that is the one question which it is my duty to bring before the Senate. I believe that the committee has done not only an unwise thing in its dealing with the subject, but I believe that it is a subject of such stupendous importance that my duty as a Senator is to bring the matter before you and to submit it to your judgment.

As I stated in the beginning, much can be said and much will be said, in favor of the proposition to raise this revenue from a less number of subjects, but the bill is the result of the committee's work. That it has been conscientiously considered there is no doubt. I do not believe that ever in the history of Congress men assembled for the purpose of performing a duty have performed that duty more conscientiously than did the members of your Finance Committee. This bill is the result of their labors. It is for you, however, to acquaint yourselves with what the committee has done, and then to exercise your judgment, so far as you are able; but in the absence of some deep conviction, it seems to me that the action of your committee is worthy of your support. So, Mr. President, I will leave the question with this body. The report of your committee is here, and I know that you will give earnest consideration to the provisions of the bill.

I merely want to add a word, and that is that under the miscellaneous provisions of the bill, other than income taxes and war-profit taxes, the revenue which is expected to be raised will amount to over $55,000,000 per month. So every day that this bill shall remain under discussion there will be a loss to the Treasury of over a million and a half dollars. I, therefore, believe that every Senator should take up this bill, understand it as soon as and as thoroughly as possible, and finally act upon the sound judgment and in accordance with the wisdom of the Members of this body.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Martin	Shafroth
Brady	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Sheppard
Brandegee	Kellogg	New	Simmons
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Smoot
Fletcher	King	Page	Sterling
France	Kirby	Pittman	Sutherland
Gore	La Follette	Poindexter	Swanson
Hollis	Lewis	Pomerene	Trammell
Husting	Lodge	Ransdell	Vardaman

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on account of illness, and will let this announcement stand for the present.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, permit me to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who has been called from the Chamber on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. REED, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. UNDERWOOD answered to their names when called.

Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. BECKHAM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if no Senator desires to address the Senate upon the bill, I ask that we begin the consideration of committee amendments. I ask that we pass over, for the present, the first two titles, one relating to income taxes and the other relating to war-profits taxes. I do this at the suggestion and request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is a member of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, under the head of "Title III.—War tax on beverages," in section 300, on page 24, line 2, after the words "after the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment"; and in line 7, after the words "three hundred and," to strike out "one" and insert "four," so as to read:

Title III.—War tax on beverages.

SEC. 300. That on and after the enactment of this act there shall be levied and collected on all distilled spirits in bond at that time or that have been or that may be then or thereafter produced in or imported into the United States, except such distilled spirits as are subject to the tax provided in section 304.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 24, line 8, after the numerals "$1.10," to insert "(or, if withdrawn for beverage purposes, a tax of $2.10)," so as to read: "in addition to the tax now imposed by law, a tax of $1.10 (or, if withdrawn for beverage purposes, a tax of $2.10) on each proof gallon, or wine gallon when below proof."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I did not know that this title would come up to-day. I am not going to take very much time on it—possibly only three or four minutes—but I should like for the title to go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not understand what he desires to have go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire that Title III, which has just been reached, go over. I have not examined it very carefully, and I did not apprehend that it would come up so soon. I ask that the sections of this title providing an increase of taxes go over—sections 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, and 305.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that I shall not delay the consideration of these sections any when they come up, but I desire to make a brief statement. I am not prepared to do so now, because I did not expect this matter to come up. I will say that my asking for it to go over now will not delay it very many minutes when it comes up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire that it shall go over for the day only?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, I think probably I shall be ready by to-morrow to say whatever I want to say with reference to the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator's request applies to section 300 down to section 305, inclusive?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. I will repeat to the Senator that I have not examined all of these different sections. I find on page 32 that there seems to be an increase in the tax. I refer to the sections that relate to an increase in the tax. Those are the sections which I desire to have go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object to the sections, beginning with 300 and going down to 305, going over, if the Senator insists upon it, but I do not see any reason why we can not proceed with the consideration of the amendments, beginning with section 306.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to passing over the sections indicated?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I did not understand what the chairman of the committee is willing to do in this matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asks that sections 300 to 305 go over until to-morrow, and I stated that I would not oppose his request.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I have a desire at all times to oblige the Senator from Washington, but I hope the chairman of the committee will not be too good-natured in granting requests of this kind or we will be postponing one title of the bill after another and make no progress. I understand the Senator from Washington only wants to make a brief statement concerning this title and has no particular hope or intention of changing its provisions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is right; but the Senator will appreciate the fact that we have already passed over twenty-odd pages of the bill, embracing two very important titles.

Mr. PENROSE. We have passed over two titles, which are, of course, half of the bill, in substance, and I deprecate that; but this is only increasing the grievance that I am beginning to accumulate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will appreciate the fact that I had no intimation that the first two titles were going over. so I was not prepared to have the succeeding title taken up.

Mr. PENROSE. As I have said, I rose with the desire on my part to facilitate the work of the Senator from Washington, but I also want to file a gentle protest and express the sincere hope that the chairman of the committee will not consent to many of these postponements.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say that I am rather moved this afternoon to be a little bit lenient, because of the fact that we have reached the amendments much earlier, I think, than anybody had any reason to expect, and I can understand why Senators probably are not this afternoon prepared to go on. What has happened this evening, however, will be notice to the Senate, and to-morrow I think we can establish and maintain probably a much stricter rule.

Mr. PENROSE. There is another phase of the matter, Mr. President. Many of us have been closely confined here in Washington for a long while, and it is hardly fair to those Members of the Senate who may want to go home or elsewhere for two or three days to have them kept waiting here on account of the postponement of the consideration of various portions of the bill. As I have said, I recognize this title has come up unexpectedly this afternoon, but I hope that hereafter we will proceed in the regular orderly way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely consented to pass over these five sections until to-morrow. I ask that the Secretary now proceed with the reading.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I shall not delay this bill; I shall take very little time; and if I had had any idea whatever that this title was coming up this afternoon I would have been ready to make the statement which I desire to make with reference to these items. I will say also that, as the Senator has intimated, I do not expect to make any particular contest with reference to this matter, nor do I expect to change the bill, but I do want to make a very brief statement with reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the reading will be continued, beginning with section 306, on page 31.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, at the top of page 31, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 306. That hereafter collectors of internal revenue shall not furnish wholesale liquor dealer's stamps in lieu of and in exchange for stamps for rectified spirits unless the package covered by stamp for rectified spirits is to be broken into smaller packages.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to discontinue the use of the following stamps whenever in his judgment the interests of the Government will be subserved thereby:

Distillery warehouse, special bonded warehouse, special bonded rewarehouse, general bonded warehouse, general bonded retransfer, transfer grapes, export tobacco, export cigars, export oleomargarine, and export fermented liquor stamps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 15, to insert:

SEC. 307. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to require at distilleries, breweries, rectifying houses, and wherever else in his judgment such action may be deemed advisable, the installation of meters, tanks, pipes, or any other apparatus for the purpose of protecting the revenue, and such meters, tanks, and pipes and all necessary labor incident thereto shall be at the expense of the person, corporation, partnership, or association on whose premises the installation is required. Any such person, corporation, partnership, or association refusing or neglecting to install such apparatus when so required by the commissioner shall not be permitted to conduct business on such premises.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we might save time if I make a suggestion now regarding this portion of the bill. I notice that most of the remaining sections of this title have to do with the increase of the tax, and I should like to have them go over until tomorrow. I suggest that the remainder of the title go over, and we can probably make time on some of these titles.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that section 308, a new section, does increase the tax.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. But section 309 covers simply administrative provisions and does not affect the tax at all. We might get the administrative provisions out of the way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all right.

Mr. LODGE. Then we can pass over section 308 and go to section 309.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, section 308 will be passed over for consideration later.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 32, after line 15, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 309. That from and after the enactment of this act taxable fermented liquors may be conveyed without payment of tax from the brewery premises where produced to a contiguous industrial distillery of either class established under the act of October 3, 1913, to be used as distilling material, and the residue from such distillation, containing not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, which is to be used in making beverages, may be manipulated by cooling, flavoring, carbonating, settling, and filtering on the distillery premises or elsewhere.

The removal of the taxable fermented liquor from the brewery to the distillery and the operation of the distillery and removal of the residue therefrom shall be under the supervision of such officer or officers as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall deem proper, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make such regulations from time to time as may be necessary to give force and effect to this section and to safeguard the revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after line 11, to strike out:

SEC. 304. That upon all still wines, including vermuth, and upon all champagne and other sparkling wines, liqueurs, cordials, artificial or imitation wines or compounds sold as wine, except wines containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol, hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, and removed from the customhouse, place of manufacture, or from bonded premises for sale or consumption, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax equal to such tax, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law. Upon wines containing not more than 14 per cent of absolute alcohol there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such wines, a tax equal to one-half such tax, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law, and the tax imposed by existing law and the additional tax herein imposed shall apply to all domestic or imported liqueurs, cordials, or similar compounds by whatever name sold or offered for sale and without reference to the kind of spirits or wines used in the manufacture thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to have section 310 go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, section 310 will be passed over for further consideration later.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 5, to change the number of the section from "305" to "311"; in line 6, after the words "three hundred and," to strike out "four" and insert "ten"; in line 8, after the words "act is," to strike out "passed" and insert "enacted"; and in line 10, after the words "to the," to strike out "tax now imposed by law" and insert "tax imposed by such section," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 311. That upon all articles specified in section 310 upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid and which are on the day this act is enacted held in excess of 25 gallons in the aggregate of such articles and intended for sale, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax equal to the tax imposed by such section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask that sections 312 and 313 may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the two sections mentioned by the Senator from Washington will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 6, to change the number of the section from "308" to "314"; in line 12, after the word "thereof," to strike out "a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold" and insert "if so sold for not more than $1.25 per gallon, a tax of 3 cents per gallon; if so sold for more than $1.25 and not more than $2 per gallon, a tax of 4 cents per gallon; if so sold for more than $2 and not more than $3 per gallon, a tax of 6 cents per gallon; if so sold for more than $3 and not more than $4 per gallon, a tax of 8 cents per gallon; and if so sold for more than $4 per gallon, a tax of 12 cents per gallon," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 314. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

(a) Upon all prepared sirups or extracts (intended for use in the manufacture or production of beverages, commonly known as soft drinks, by soda fountains, bottling establishments, and other similar places) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, if so sold for not more than $1.25 per gallon, a tax of 3 cents per gallon; if so sold for more than $1.25 and not more than $2 per gallon, a tax of 4 cents per gallon; if so sold for more than $2 and not more than $3 per gallon, a tax of 6 cents per gallon; if so sold for more than $3 and not more than $4 per gallon, a tax of 8 cents per gallon; and if so sold for more than $4 per gallon, a tax of 12 cents per gallon; and

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment.

It seems that the House of Representatives put what amounted to a 10 per cent tax on all the sirups used in these soft drinks, and the Senate has substituted a specific tax. Can the Senator from North Carolina tell me how much less this tax is than the other one would be, or why this change was made?

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the House bill, the tax imposed on these sirups and extracts was a gross-sales tax; that is, 10 per cent of the price for which they were sold—not exactly a gross-sales tax, but a tax upon the price at which the sirup was sold, equivalent to a gross-sales tax of 10 per cent, without any reference to the profits that might be made. In the first place, the committee thought that was rather a dangerous method of taxation. A gross-sales tax of 10 per cent would be equal to a very heavy net-profits tax. The committee thought, however, that there ought to be a tax upon these sirups and these extracts, and after hearing the representatives of the various companies manufacturing these extracts and sirups we reached the conclusion that the best way of reaching it was by this method. I will state to the Senator that I do not think it would be anything like as heavy as the tax imposed by the House. I have not worked out the exact proportion between the tax we imposed and the tax the House imposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think I have the floor for the present. I am yielding to the Senator from North Carolina first.

Mr. SMOOT. I was just going to say to the Senator that instead of 10 per cent this would average a little less than 3 per cent; or, in other words, about 70 per cent less than the House provided for in the bill that came over to the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for that explanation, and I want to make this observation——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means 3 per cent upon the gross sales.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon the gross sales.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I think that is a very high gross-sales tax.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think myself that even that is pretty high.

What directed my attention particularly to this matter is that there are some manufacturers of Chero-cola and such like drinks who reside in my State and do business there. They are men of limited capital, who are doing rather a large volume of business on a relatively small capital. Their gross receipts and gross sales amount to a very large sum of money, but their profits, they tell me, are small; and a tax of any considerable per cent on gross sales, all the money that goes through their hands in a business way, on everything they sell, would ruin any one of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have not the hearings here, and I do not carry in my mind the exact statements; but my recollection is that several of the representatives of these extract and sirup houses stated that the tax would be far in excess of their total profits.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is undoubtedly true. I remember that one of them, a very capable young business man from my State, who is now a member of the Legislature of Georgia, told me that he would rather that Congress would pass a law taking half or two-thirds of his income, or all of it, than to pass a law that imposed a tax on his gross sales; that it amounted not only to taking all of his income, but to a confiscation of his business. I was naturally very much opposed to that, as I think any Senator would have been, and I promised him to do all in my power to present the matter to the Senate so that that would not be done; and what I am particularly anxious to do at the present moment is to see whether this specific tax which the committee has imposed will only require these people to pay a reasonable and ordinary tax on their business, and they ought to be required to do no more.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had time to look over the testimony that was given before the committee, he would find out that the tax imposed here will not embarrass the business. The tax imposed here is upon each gallon sold. The most of it is sold at $1.25 to $2 per gallon, and the tax of 3 cents per gallon that we impose here is only a small percentage of the profits of the concern upon each gallon of sirup sold; so we are not destroying the business. But I want to say to the Senator that I do believe that if the House provision had remained as a tax of 10 per cent on the gross sales there is but one sirup manufacturer in the United States that could withstand the tax, and that is the Coca-Cola people. The business of every other manufacturer in the United States would be utterly wiped out under that provision. But I am quite sure, I will say to the Senator, that in the case of the tax imposed by the Senate all of these companies can stand it; and the way it is imposed it is very easy, indeed, to pass it on to the purchaser of the sirup. I will say, further, that when you pay 3 cents upon a gallon that goes to a soda-water fountain it is such a small and infinitesimal amount upon a glass of soda water that it will never reach the consumer; or, in other words, this will be absorbed between the sirup manufacturer and the consumer.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suppose the Senator is right about that, and I want to congratulate the committee on this change. It did look to me like a monstrous proposition to take these young men who are struggling in business, and who are willing to give up any percentage of their income that the Congress wanted to take for the purposes of the Government, and practically not only take all their income but confiscate their property. I am glad to see that this provision will avert that trouble, and I have no objection to the amendment if that is the effect of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think section 301 was adopted before my attention was called to the fact that we were on these items. That covers the same thing that these other sections cover.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that section 301 was not adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was not? Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not even read.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 24, after the word "importer," to strike out "thereof" and insert "thereof" with a comma; and, on page 38, line 3, after the words "tax of," to strike out "2 cents" and insert "1 cent," so as to make the clause read:

(b) Upon all unfermented grape juice, soft drinks or artificial mineral waters (not carbonated), and fermented liquors containing less than one-half per cent of alcohol, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof in bottles or other closed containers, and upon all ginger ale, root beer, sarsaparilla, pop, and other carbonated waters or beverages, manufactured and sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer of the carbonic acid gas used in carbonating the same, a tax of 1 cent per gallon; and

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 8, after the words "1 cent per," to strike out "gallon; and" and insert "gallon," so as to make the clause read:

(c) Upon all natural mineral waters or table waters, sold by the producer, bottler, or importer thereof, in bottles or other closed containers, at over 10 cents per gallon, a tax of 1 cent per gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 8, to strike out:

(d) Upon all carbonic acid gas in drums or other containers (intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or other drinks) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, a tax of 8 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 13, to change the number of the section from "309" to "315."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 316. That upon all carbonic acid gas in drums or other containers (intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or other drinks) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax of 5 cents per pound. Such tax shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor thereof and shall be collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section 503.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee relative to the words "intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or other drinks." How is that intended to benefit the bill? How are we to know or decide what the intended use is?

Mr. SIMMONS. The purpose of this section is to impose this tax only upon the carbonic acid intended for use in the manufacture or production of carbonated water or other drinks.

Mr. BRADY. How are we to determine what the intent is?

Mr. SIMMONS. The tax is paid only by the purchaser who buys for the purpose of using it in the manufacture of these waters.

Mr. BRADY. I suppose the intended use would be governed in some way by a statement from the purchaser of what it is his intention to do with the carbonic acid.

Mr. SIMMONS. The purchaser has to pay this tax, and the vendors of these several drinks will have to pay this tax, and they are the only ones who will have to pay this tax. However, of course, I take it the department will require from them a statement of the amount of this carbonic acid that they had purchased every month or every quarter, as the case might be.

Mr. BRADY. That was the point upon which I desired information. The use for which they intend it will be governed by some regulation of the department?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The Senator will understand that we are imposing this 5 per cent tax upon carbonic acid simply for the purpose of reaching the soda water sold at the fountains and in the bottling establishments, instead of imposing a tax directly upon the glass of soda water.

Mr. BRADY. I understand the intent of the bill, but I was just bothered in my mind as to how we should determine when that tax should be paid. Will that be determined by the man selling it, or by the man purchasing it?

Mr. SIMMONS. That will be under the regulation of the department, as to the method of ascertaining whether it was purchased with the intent to be used in this way, so as to subject it to the tax.

Mr. BRADY. It is the intent of the committee, then, that the purchasers shall be governed by some regulation of the department?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BRADY. Determining what the article is to be used for?

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill provides for regulation in the administrative section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Title IV.—War tax on cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof," in section 400, page 39, line 10, after the word "thereof," to insert "(a)"; in line 13, before the word "on," to insert "(b)"; in line 15, after the words "retail at," to strike out "not more than"; in line 16, before the word "each," to insert "or more"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "50 cents per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 4 cents"; in line 18, before the word "cents," to strike out "6" and insert "7"; in the same line, before the word "if," to insert "(c)"; in line 19, before the word "cents," to strike out "6" and insert "7"; in the same line, after the word "cents," to insert "each"; in line 20, before the word "cents," to strike out "10" and insert "15"; in the same line, before the words "per thousand," to strike out "$2" and insert "$3"; in the same line, before the word "if," to insert "(d)"; in line 21, before the word "cents," to strike out "10" and insert "15"; in the same line, after the word "cents," to insert "each"; in line 22, before the word "cents," to strike out "15" and insert "20"; in the same line, before the words "per thousand," to strike out "$4" and insert "$5"; in the same line, before the word "if," to insert "(e)"; in line 23, after the words "more than," to strike out "15 cents and not more than"; in line 24, before the words "per thousand," to strike out "$5" and insert "$7"; in the same line, after the word "thousand," to strike out "if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 20 cents and not more than 25 cents each, $7 per thousand; if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 25 cents each, $10 per thousand"; on page 40, line 5, after the word "manufacturer," to insert "or importer"; in line 6, after the word "indicating," to strike out "the maximum retail price of each cigar" and insert "by letter the clause of this section under which the cigars therein contained have been tax paid"; in line 10, before the word "on," to insert "(f)"; in line 13, before the words "per thousand," to strike out "$1.25" and insert "75 cents"; and in the same line, after the words "per thousand," to insert "weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand, $1.20 per thousand," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 400. That upon cigars and cigarettes, which shall be manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the taxes now imposed by existing law, the following taxes, to be paid by the manufacturer or importer thereof: (a) On cigars of all descriptions made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, and weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, 25 cents per thousand; (b) on cigars made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, and weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand, if manufactured or imported to retail at 4 cents or more each, and not more than 7 cents each, $1 per thousand; (c) if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 7 cents each and not more than 15 cents each, $3 per thousand; (d) if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 15 cents each and not more than 20 cents each, $5 per thousand; (e) if manufactured or imported to retail at more than 20 cents each, $7 per thousand: Provided, That the word "retail" as used in this section shall mean the ordinary retail price of a single cigar, and that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may, by regulation, require the manufacturer or importer to affix to each box or container a conspicuous label indicating by letter the clause of this section under which the cigars therein contained have been tax paid, which must correspond with the tax-paid stamp on said box or container; (f) on cigarettes made of tobacco, or any substitute therefor, made in or imported into the United States, and weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, 75 cents per thousand; weighing more than 3 pounds per thousand, $1.20 per thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 14, to strike out:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall provide the dies and stamps for cigars and cigarettes necessary under the taxes in effect, and the sizes of packages authorized, after the provisions of this title take effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 25, before the word "eight," to strike out "seven"; in the same line, before the word "ten," to strike out "nine"; in the same line, after the word "ten," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "twelve"; in the same line, before the word "sixteen," to strike out "fourteen" and insert "fifteen"; in line 26, before the word "twenty," to strike out "eighteen, nineteen," and in the same line, before the word "forty," to insert "twenty-four"; so as to make the clause read:

Every manufacturer of cigarettes (including small cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per 1,000) shall put up all the cigarettes and such small cigars that he manufactures or has manufactured for him, and sells or removes for consumption or use, in packages or parcels containing 5, 8, 10, 12, 15, 16, 20, 24, 40, 50, 80, or 100 cigarettes each, and shall securely affix to each of said packages or parcels a suitable stamp denoting the tax thereon and shall properly cancel the same prior to such sale or removal for consumption or use under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and all cigarettes imported from a foreign country shall be packed, stamped, and the stamps canceled in a like manner, in addition to the import stamp indicating inspection of the customhouse before they are withdrawn therefrom.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 401, page 41, line 14, after the word "tax," to strike out "equal to such tax" and insert "of 4 cents per pound," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 401. That upon all tobacco and snuff hereafter manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or use, there shall be levied and collected, in addition to the tax now imposed by law upon such articles, a tax of 4 cents per pound, to be levied, collected, and paid under the provisions of existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 402, page 42, line 1, before the word "days," to strike out "30" and insert "10"; in the same line, after the words "after the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment"; in line 6, before the word "days," to strike out "90" and insert "10"; in the same line, after the words "after the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment"; and, in line 7, after the word "act," to strike out: "Provided, That after the passage of this act and before the expiration of the aforesaid 90 days, cigarettes may be put up in the packages now provided for by law or in the packages provided for in section 400," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 402. That so much of section 400 as imposes a tax upon cigars, and the whole of section 401, shall take effect 10 days after the enactment of this act. That section 404 and so much of section 400 as imposes a tax upon cigarettes and as relates to packages or parcels in which cigarettes may be put up shall take effect 10 days after the enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 403, page 42, line 11, after the words "also be," to strike out "assessed" and insert "levied"; in line 13, before the word "pounds," to strike out "thousand" and insert "hundred"; in the same line, after the word "pounds," to insert "at any one place of business"; in line 14, before the word "upon," to strike out "or" and insert "and"; in the same line, after the word "cigars," to insert "in excess of 500 at any one place of business"; in line 15, before the word "cigarettes," to strike out "or" and insert "and upon"; in line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "one"; in the same line, after the word "thousand," to insert "at any one place of business"; in line 17, before the word "prior," to strike out "customshouse" and insert "customhouse"; in the same line, after the words "prior to the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment"; in line 21, after the words "act is," to strike out "passed" and insert "enacted"; in line 24, after the words "factory or," to strike out "customshouse" and insert "customhouse"; and in the same line, after the words "after the," to strike out "passage" and insert "enactment," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 403. That there shall also be levied and collected upon all manufactured tobacco and snuff in excess of 100 pounds at any one place of business and upon cigars in excess of 500 at any one place of business and upon cigarettes in excess of 1,000 at any one place of business which were manufactured or imported and removed from factory or customhouse prior to the enactment of this act, bearing tax-paid stamps affixed to such articles for the payment of the taxes thereon, and which are, on the day this act is enacted, held and intended for sale by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, and upon all manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, or cigarettes removed from factory or customhouse after the enactment of this act but prior to the time when the tax imposed by section 400 or section 401 upon such articles takes effect, an additional tax equal to one-half the tax imposed by such sections upon such articles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 404, page 43, line 3, after the words "shall be," to strike out "levied," and insert "levied, assessed"; in line 7, after the word "set," to strike out "containing not more than 25 papers, one-fourth of 1 cent"; and in line 14, after the word "thereof," to strike out "Such tax shall be paid by stamps affixed by the person, corporation, partnership, or association making up or importing such package, book, set, or tube," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 404. That there shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon cigarette paper made up into packages, books, sets, or tubes, made up in or imported into the United States and intended for use by the smoker in making cigarettes the following taxes: On each package, book, or set containing more than 25 but not more than 50 papers one-half of 1 cent; containing more than 50 but not more than 100 papers, 1 cent; containing more than 100 papers, 1 cent for each 100 papers or fractional part thereof; and upon tubes 2 cents for each 100 tubes or fractional part thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of Title V.—War Tax on Facilities Furnished by Public Utilities, and Insurance, on page 42, line 6, after the word "Utilties," to strike out "and Insurance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 500, page 43, line 20, after the words "day of," to strike out "June"; in line 24, after the word "water," to insert "or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water," so as to read:

SEC. 500. That from and after the first day of ———, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (a) a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation by rail or water or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water of property by freight consigned from one point in the United States to another.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, line 1, after the words "another; (b)," to strike out "a tax equivalent to 6 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of property by express companies consigned from one point in the United States to another" and insert "a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents, or fraction thereof, paid to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, engaged in the business of transporting parcels or packages by express over regular routes between fixed terminals, for the transportation of any package, parcel, or shipment by express from one point in the United States to another."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, this is a tax imposed upon the express companies, as I understand it. The Senator who reported the bill has put against that, in order to equalize the matter, a provision on page 71, beginning in line 9, for a stamp tax on all parcel-post matter that is handled by the Government of the United States. The two propositions of course, I take it, are linked together by the committee. If so, I ask that this amendment be passed over for the present at least, because I am opposed to the provision on page 71 and will move to strike it out. I think even the Senator from North Carolina will probably be in favor of striking it out when he understands exactly what it means and what the Post Office Department thinks about it and the way they construe it. I do not object to the adoption of this section just read if the Senator wants it to be adopted, if it stands alone, but if it depends on the retention of the matter on page 71 in relation to parcel-post business of the Government I think we had better pass it over and consider the two together.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think the one depends necessarily upon the other. So far as I am personally concerned, and I think the committee had the same view, I should be in favor of the tax upon the express companies, even if the tax on the parcel-post matter is not levied.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then when we come to the provision on page 71 the Senator is going to urge as against the motion to strike out the proposition that it is necessary to retain it in order to be fair and just to the express companies, I take it.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would be a matter of argument.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator is going to take that position we had just as well have the arguments now before we adopt either one of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator having the bill in charge to let the amendment go over at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection in the world to its going over.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say either that or else let us discuss it now, because to me the action of the Senate on the pending amendment will make a difference as to how I shall vote upon the parcel-post provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. I take it that will be the case with many Senators. I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina is going to be able to retain the section on page 71.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. Does the Senator from Georgia want just the amendment passed over or the whole section?

Mr. HARDWICK. Just the particular amendment I designate about the express tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 44, in line 15, before the words "per centum," to strike out "ten" and insert "five"; in line 18, after the word "water," to insert "or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water"; in line 7, after the word "water," to strike out "within the United States" and insert "from one point in the United States to another or to any point in Canada or Mexico, where the ticket therefor is sold or issued in the United States"; in line 22, before the word "miles," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty"; in line 23, before the word "cents," to strike out "25" and insert "35"; in line 24, before the words "per centum," to strike out "ten" and insert "five"; in line 26, before the word "mileage," to strike out "ticket or"; on page 45, line 4, before the word "mileage," to strike out "ticket or"; in line 9, after the word "may," to strike out "prescribe" and insert "prescribe; if a ticket (other than a mileage book) is bought and partially used before this section goes into effect it shall not be taxed, but if bought but not so used before this section takes effect, it shall not be valid for passage until the tax has been paid and such payment evidenced on the ticket in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe"; in line 18, after the words "pipe line," to strike out "(e) a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for electric power for domestic uses, and of the amount paid for light or heat service, and a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for telephone service by subscribers, exclusive of the amounts paid for toll or long-distance calls; (f)"; in line 23, before the words "a tax," to insert "(e)"; in the same line, after the word "each," to insert "telegraph, telephone, or radio"; in line 25, after the word "originated," to strike out "at any office, station, or exchange"; in line 26, after the words "United States," to strike out "of any telegraph or telephone line, which is transmitted over such lines"; on page 46, line 1, after the word "for," to insert "the transmission of"; and in line 4, after the word "lines," to insert "or stations," so as to read:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to require the carrier paying such tax to list separately in any bill of lading, freight receipt, or other similar document the amount of the tax herein levied, if the total amount of the freight and tax be therein stated; (c) a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of persons by rail or water, or by any form of mechanical motor power when in competition with carriers by rail or water, from one point in the United States to another or to any point in Canada or Mexico, where the ticket therefor is sold or issued in the United States, not including the amount paid for commutation or season tickets for trips less than 40 miles, or for transportation the fare for which does not exceed 35 cents, and a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for seats, berths, and staterooms in parlor cars, sleeping cars, or on vessels. If a ticket or mileage book used for such transportation or accommodation has been purchased before this section takes effect, or if cash fare be paid, the tax imposed by this section shall be collected from the person presenting the ticket or mileage book, or paying the cash fare, by the conductor or other agent, when presented for such transportation or accommodation, and the amount so collected shall be paid to the United States in such manner and at such times as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, but this tax shall not apply to tickets, other than mileage books, bought and partially used before this section goes into effect; (d) a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of oil by pipe line; (e) a tax of 5 cents upon each telegraph, telephone, or radio dispatch, message, or conversation which originates within the United States and for the transmission of which a charge of 15 cents or more is imposed: Provided, That only one payment of such tax shall be required, notwithstanding the lines or stations of one or more persons, corporations, partnerships, or associations shall be used for the transmission of such dispatch, message, or conversation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 501, page 46, line 11, after the word "case," to strike out "a" and insert "the"; in the same line, after the word "carrier," to strike out "by rail, water, or pipe line"; in line 23, after the word "this," to insert "or the preceding"; in line 24, after the word "tax," to insert "(a)"; and on page 47, line 1, after the words "so used," to insert "or has been so used; or (b) upon the transportation of company material transported by one carrier which constitutes a part of a railroad system for another carrier which is also a part of the same system; or (c) upon movements by railroad companies of the outfit, property, and persons of any amusement company which, in the conduct of its business, owns and provides its rolling stock and equipment and which is not engaged in the transportation of commodities for sale or exchange; or (d) upon the amount paid for special mileage books issued under transportation contract to such amusement companies and used for the transportation of its bona fide employees and agents," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 501. That the taxes imposed by section 500 shall be paid by the person, corporation, partnership, or association paying for the services or facilities rendered.

In case the carrier does not, because of its ownership of the commodity transported, or for any other reason, receive the amount which as a carrier it would otherwise charge, such carrier shall pay a tax equivalent to the tax which would be imposed upon the transportation of such commodity if the carrier received payment for such transportation: Provided, That in case of a carrier which on May 1, 1917, had no rates or tariffs on file with the proper Federal or State authority, the tax shall be computed on the basis of the rates or tariffs of other carriers for like services as ascertained and determined by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Provided further, That nothing in this or the preceding section shall be construed as imposing a tax (a) upon the transportation of any commodity which is necessary for the use of the carrier in the conduct of its business as such and is intended to be so used or has been so used; or (b) upon the transportation of company material transported by one carrier, which constitutes a part of a railroad system, for another carrier which is also a part of the same system; or (c) upon movements by railroad companies of the outfit, property, and persons of any amusement company, which, in the conduct of its business, owns and provides its rolling stock and equipment and which is not engaged in the transportation of commodities for sale or exchange; or (d) upon the amount paid for special mileage books issued under transportation contract to such amusement companies and used for the transportation of its bona fide employees and agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 502, page 47, line 15, after the words "rendered to," to strike out "officers or employees of the United States, or of any State or political subdivision thereof, in the course of their official business" and insert "the United States, or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this section shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 502. That no tax shall be imposed under section 500 upon any payment received for services rendered to the United States, or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this section shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 8, to strike out:

SEC. 504. That from and after the 1st day of June, 1917, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid the following taxes on the issuance of insurance policies:

(a) Life insurance: A tax equivalent to 8 cents on each $100 or fractional part thereof of the amount for which any life is insured under any policy of insurance, or other instrument, by whatever name the same is called: Provided, That on all policies for life insurance only by which a life is insured not in excess of $500, issued on the industrial or weekly payment plan of insurance, the tax shall be 40 per cent of the amount of the first weekly premium: Provided further, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision;

(b) Marine, inland, and fire insurance: A tax equivalent to 1 cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof of the premium charged under each policy of insurance or other instrument by whatever name the same is called whereby insurance is made or renewed upon property of any description (including rents or profits), whether against peril by sea or inland waters, or by fire or lightning, or other peril: Provided, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision;

(c) Casualty insurance: A tax equivalent to 1 cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof of the premium charged under each policy of insurance or obligation of the nature of indemnity for loss, damage, or liability (except bonds taxable under subdivision 2 of schedule A of Title VIII) issued or executed or renewed by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, transacting the business of employer's liability, workmen's compensation, accident, health, tornado, plate glass, steam boiler, elevator, burglary, automatic sprinkler, automobile, or other branch of insurance (except life insurance, and insurance described and taxed in the preceding subdivision): Provided, That policies of reinsurance shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this subdivision;

(d) Policies issued by any person, corporation, partnership, or association, whose income is exempt from taxation under Title I of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, shall be exempt from the taxes imposed by this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 50, to strike out:

SEC. 505. That every person, corporation, partnership, or association issuing policies of insurance upon the issuance of which a tax is imposed by section 504 shall, within the first 15 days of each month, make a return under oath, in duplicate, and pay such tax to the collector of internal revenue of the district in which the principal office or place of business of such person, corporation, partnership, or association is located. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulation prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 12, in the headline, after the word "War," to strike out "Tax on manufactures" and insert "Excise taxes," so as to read:

Title VI.—War excise taxes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 600, line 14, after "SEC. 600," to strike out "That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid—

"(a) Upon all automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, and motorcycles, and automobile, motorcycle, or bicycle tires (including inner tubes) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the price for which so sold: Provided, That from the tax which otherwise would be imposed upon a manufacturer, producer, or importer of automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, or motorcycles there shall be deducted an amount equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid for the tires, including inner tubes, on such vehicles by such manufacturer, producer, or importer; and," and insert "(a) That on the day this act takes effect, and thereafter on July 1 in each year, and also at the time of the original purchase of a new automobile or motorcycle by a user, if on any other date than July 1, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, upon the use of automobiles and motorcycles not used exclusively for business, an excise tax at basic rates as follows: Motorcycles, $2.50; automobiles the original listed retail price of which is not over $500, $5; original listed retail price over $500 and not over $750, $7.50; original listed retail price over $750 and not over $1,000, $10; and for each further increase of $500 or fractional part thereof of original listed retail price an additional tax of $5.

"In the case of a tax imposed at the time of the original purchase of a new automobile or motorcycle on any other date than July 1, the amount to be paid shall be the same number of twelfths of the amount of the tax as the number of calendar months, including the month of sale, remaining prior to the following July 1.

"The tax payable in any year shall be reduced by 10 per cent of its basic amount for each 12 months elapsed since the original sale of the automobile or motorcycle by the manufacturer or importer, but in no case shall it be reduced to less than 50 per cent of such basic amount."

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee how they arrived at the determination of the retail price of $500 for an automobile. The information I desire for this reason: A large number of cars in the past have been selling for from $450 to $500 that are now selling and will sell during this war for at least $600. If we are trying to favor the class of people who use the cheap car for their necessary purposes, it seems to me the committee has placed that first price $100 too low. The other prices, I think, are entirely correct all the way through. As an illustration, some standard cars on June 1 of this year were selling for $500, and the same car is selling for over $600 now. There are a great many cars on which upon August 1 the price was put up $100. I know a party who attempted to buy a car in June, and July 1 the price had risen $100.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean the manufacturer's price?

Mr. BRADY. The manufacturer's price. It has been absolutely necessary to raise the price on account of the higher cost of material and labor. A minimum a year ago of $500 would mean a minimum at the present day of $600.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension as to the meaning of the language employed. "Automobiles the original listed retail price of which is not over $500." I take it that means the listed price at the time of the purchase of the machine, the price which the owner had to pay the manufacturer.

Mr. BRADY. That is quite true.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the price of automobiles has gone up since he bought it, that would not affect the tax he would have to pay, nor would it probably affect it if the price had gone down.

Mr. BRADY. But it would affect the purchaser of the automobile at the time this law goes into effect. People are going to keep on buying automobiles, and the law specifically contemplates that, for the reason that in the section you provide that the purchaser shall pay the tax for one-twelfth of a year for one month. I think it would be well for the Senate to give the matter serious consideration before adopting this section, for the price of $500 at the time the committee commenced the consideration of the bill is $600 to-day.

Mr SIMMONS. I do not conceive that that would make any difference at all. What the individual taxpayer will have to pay will depend upon the listed price at the time he bought his machine. It will not be affected the slightest by any change in that price after he bought his machine. If the listed price is over $500 and not over $750 at the time he buys the machine, then he pays $7.50. If it is not over $500, he pays $5.

Mr. BRADY. I do not think the Senator gets my viewpoint. There are a great many people in the country who are buying automobiles for family use and for general purposes, and they are buying just about a $500 machine.

Such automobiles have gone up in price to $600, and it is hardly fair for us to penalize that class of people and make them pay a tax of $7.50 when they have to pay $100 more for the automobile. I believe it would be fair and equitable to raise the minimum price—that is, the first price provided for in the bill, which is $500—to $600.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator realizes that the purchaser of an automobile ranging in price anywhere between $500 and $750 has to pay identically the same tax, whether that car is a $600 or a $650 car.

Mr. BRADY. He would under the pending bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. He would under this bill, and that is the purpose of the provision. It is just like every other case where there is a graduated scale. A man if he just gets above the rate has to pay as much as if he is just below the next higher rate.

Mr. BRADY. I understand that, and I thoroughly agree with the Senator from North Carolina; but I think we have placed the minimum too low. There are thousands of people in the United States who buy automobiles the price of which in the past has been reckoned at $500, which, owing to the high cost of labor and material, is now $600; and yet it is proposed to impose on them a proportionally higher tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. What amendment or change would the Senator suggest?

Mr. BRADY. I suggest merely that where the original retail price is not over $600 the tax be $5.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not see that any good would result by making that change.

Mr. BRADY. If that were done, we would simply provide that those who buy what heretofore have been $500 automobiles, but which are now selling for $100 more, shall be taxed just the same as if they could purchase the cars for $500. I am perfectly willing that the tax shall be taken off of that character of automobile, if it is a question of revenue, and that it shall be placed on the higher-priced automobiles; but there are thousands of people who use that class of automobiles in their family and for business purposes. The average price of such cars in the past has been $500, but the price has been raised.

Mr. SIMMONS. To what automobile does the Senator refer—to the Ford?

Mr. BRADY. No; it is only certain classes of the Ford machine that would come under this category. There is a great number and great variety of trucks and automobiles of that kind which are now selling for $500, and though their price has not yet been raised, I understand it will be raised to $600. There is the Maxwell machine; I can not recall all the names at the moment, but if the Senator from North Carolina will investigate the matter he will find that there is a statement in last Sunday's newspaper in regard to it. I think it was stated that there were 48 different makes of cars the price of which has been increased since January 1 last.

I do not care anything about the tax which is imposed on high-priced cars. All I am asking is that the minimum for low-priced cars shall be so fixed that a high tax shall not be imposed on those who use them for business and pleasure purposes, on families, for instance, who can not afford to pay a high price.

I suggest that we amend the provision so that the lowest rate will apply to $600 cars; and if, after investigation, the committee finds that is not sound policy, they can lower the amount. I do not suggest a change as to any other tax in the section.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not willing to agree to the suggestion of the Senator, for this measure was worked out with considerable care and after very extensive investigation; and I am inclined to think that it is correct.

Mr. BRADY. Does not the chairman of the committee feel that it would be wise to have the section passed over and himself to investigate the matter and see if he does not agree to my suggestion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that the committee tried to investigate the matter very thoroughly. If, however, the Senator makes a personal request to have the section go over, I shall not feel disposed to resist it, because I have yielded to such requests from other Senators this evening on account of the peculiar and exceptional conditions under which we have taken up the bill for the consideration of committee amendments.

Mr. BRADY. I certainly do not desire in the least to delay the passage of the bill, and unless the Senator is entirely agreeable to the request, I shall not ask to have the section passed over. I believe, however, that it would be wise to have it passed over, at least until to-morrow, and if the chairman of the committee himself at that time thinks that it is not proper to increase the minimum limit of price, I shall be perfectly satisfied to let the tax apply to $500 machines.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not resist the Senator's request.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to ask, relative to this section, why it would not be better to have the automobile manufacturer pay this tax than to put it on the purchasers of the automobiles? I understand the automobile manufacturing business is one of the most highly profitable businesses in the United States; that nothing excels it in the production of profit except the munition plants.

The very fact that has been mentioned by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] is apparent to everybody in America, that the automobile manufacturers have very recently increased prices on their cars from $50 to $100, $250, and $500. If that is done, why should they not be required to pay this tax, if the tax is necessary? They are raising the price of their machines without regard to whether or not the tax is imposed upon them. It seems to me that the House provision to tax them would be more fair, and certainly the revenue would be more easily collected from the manufacturer than it would be from the individual owner, who has already paid an enormous profit, according to the facts and statistics so far as the manufacture of automobiles is concerned. The point I want to understand is why the House provision has been changed, and why it should not be left in the bill as it was?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have no disposition to go into a discussion of this matter this afternoon. The Senator from Arkansas asks me the question why we have not retained the House rates upon automobiles.

Mr. KIRBY. Not so much the rates but the scheme.

Mr. SIMMONS. I incidentally discussed that in the statement which I made to the Senate last week. The House imposed a gross-sales tax of 5 per cent upon automobile manufacturers; that is, 5 per cent upon the sale price of automobiles. The tax upon one automobile would amount in the case of a $500 machine to $25; in the case of a $1,000 machine, to $50. As I said in my general statement made to the Senate, the committee decided that gross-sales taxes were not an economically sound way of raising revenue, because they are so many times more than the net-profits tax. Such taxes are levied without any reference to the profit that may be made on the sale. It is easy to see that in very many instances the tax would exceed the actual profits arising out of the sale. So, for those general reasons we struck out practically all the gross-sales taxes which were imposed by the other House and substituted some other method of taxation.

In the case of the automobile, of course, the Senator from Arkansas understands that if we impose a tax of $25 or of $50 or of $100 on an automobile the manufacturer is going to pass that on, if he can, to the purchaser, especially when the tax is made high. A gross-sales tax is no more paid by the manufacturer than a liquor tax is paid by the man who manufactures the liquor. When you impose a gross-sales tax as high as $50 you must have that in mind. It is not a tax which the manufacturer would pay, but is a tax which the purchaser would pay—which the owner of the machine would pay. Your committee thought that a tax of $25 on a Ford machine was rather too much for the purchaser of such a machine to pay. We thought that a better solution of the matter would be to impose a small tax upon the owners of automobiles, feeling absolutely certain that if it were possible—and I presume it would be possible—the manufacturer would pass the tax on, and in the case of automobiles it would be generally five times as high as the tax proposed in this bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, is this not a yearly tax imposed by this section?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So that it could not be imposed very well upon the manufacturers without requiring the outlay of a very large lump sum to begin with, whereas if imposed upon individuals who use the machines year by year it would naturally fall upon the persons who use the machines and use the roads?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that this bill has been taken up for the consideration of amendments rather unexpectedly. The attendance in the Senate Chamber is hardly sufficient to warrant a continuation of its consideration. It is almost 5 o'clock now, and it is desired to have an executive session. I suggest to the Senator, therefore, that the bill be laid aside now, and after the executive session that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it desired to have an executive session?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. Then, we will convene at any hour the Senator says, and we will all know in advance that we are expected to be here and will have our memoranda and papers and be prepared to go on with the discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I did not know it was contemplated to hold an executive session. The Senator from Georgia says that is the purpose, and, in view of that statement and the fact that we have not very much of an attendance this afternoon—which I attribute in part to the fact that Senators did not know the bill would be taken up for the consideration of amendments this evening—I shall ask that this bill be laid aside for the present.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the committee, whether he expects soon to make a request for unanimous consent to take a vote on the bill at some time in the not distant future?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that it is my purpose to make such a request at an opportune time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When does the Senator think he will make the request?

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I can not now say definitely when I will make it, but as soon as an opportune time has come, and I think that will be in a few days.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the general impression is that the debate will not continue long on the amendments, and I hope that we will agree upon a time, not unreasonably short, but say within 10 days or two weeks.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, as I understand he has the floor, we have had no real debate on this bill yet. The real debate is coming, and coming, of course, at considerable length on the amendments.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I did not suppose there would be much discussion on the amendments.

Mr. HARDWICK. There will be a good deal of discussion, and I think we will get along a little better if we do not try to hasten matters too much. I do not think any Senator wants to delay the measure; we are all tired of this session and want to get home, but we can not make an agreement yet.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think, Mr. President, after we have considered the bill a little while longer the Senate will probably be in a frame of mind which will make it possible for us to come to some unanimous-consent agreement. I question whether that time has yet arrived. As soon as I feel that it has, I assure the Senator that I shall make the request and do what I can to get an agreement that will place a limitation upon the debate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hope the Senator will do so, for I am certain that Senators generally want to get away, and they want to close this matter within a reasonable time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, on the request of the Senator from North Carolina, the pending bill will be temporarily laid aside.

SHIPPING CORPORATION.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have in my hand an interesting document which I have just received and read, being a statement of the former president of the Shipping Board concerning the affairs of the Emergency Shipping Corporation, which I consider of very great value to Congress and to those who have succeeded in the administration of that important work and those engaged in similar war-time investments on behalf of the Government. The gentleman who makes the statement, Mr. William Denman, is a fellow townsman of mine, and I am familiar with his high character and eminent public service. At a time of great official corruption in my city he was one of the men who redeemed the community. I feel, apart from the value of the document to those who have succeeded in the work, that he is personally entitled to make this statement; and, to give it publicity, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator will he not withdraw his objection?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I think if we undertake now to fill the RECORD with statements made by the contending officials of the Shipping Board there will be no end to such an undertaking. The President has acted; the country has accepted his action; the case is closed; and, so far as I am concerned, I want it to remain closed, at least as affecting the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and publication in public documents in any way.

I desire to say to the Senator from California that if a friend of Gen. Goethals had come here and made a similar request to publish and send broadcast a statement defending his position as a member of the board I would have objected just as strongly as I do now. I think the Senator from California, if he will stop to consider this question, will ultimately agree with me that my position is right.
